A dispatch had been received from Secretary Stanton, authorizing Maj. Montgomery to charter a steamer to transport to the Tennessee river such a corps of physicians and nurses, with necessary supplies, as the Board of Trade might organize and send out, and also to bring back a reasonable number of the wounded in the recent battle. The committee determined

The Battle at Winchester. A dispatch from Richmond, dated March 96, says President Davis had that morning received a letter from General Jackso stating that he had a fight near Winchester, on Sunday, with a Federal force of 18,000, which lasted till 4 r. M., when the firing ceased on both sides. Jackson fell back ceased on both sides. Jackson fell back after night to a better position at Cedar Creek, leaving Col. Ashby on the field until next morning. The Federals, Jackson says, moved also in the night, retreating back towards Winchester. His loss was considerable in officers and men, whilst that of the Enderals was grounded. that of the Federals was enormous.

Jeff. Davis on Conscription. RICHMOND, March 29.—President Davis has sent a message to Congress, asking a repeal of all existing military laws and ad vocating the enactment of a conscript law instead. tack, the Merrimac has realized the calculations of European constructors. It must now be looked upon as proved that wooden vessels go to sure and speedy defeat whenever they venture into action against an iron-plated adversary. Those who object to iron sides that they are not invulnerable, inasmuch as, however strong the ship may be, cannon can be constructed powerful enough to pierce it, must, we see in the Merrimac that a vessel can be made practically invulnerable cren to the heavy naval guns which are at present in use. Nothing now remains for the Admiralty but to discontinue the building of wooden vessels, and to convert all that will bear it into machines of war resembling the Confederate frigate. The only real opponent which the Merrimac found was another iron-plated frigate, and, had it not been for this vessel, it is possible that the Merrimac might have destroyed the whole federal squadron. The Merrimae is described as "covered with sloping iron plates, extending two feet below the water line, and meeting above like the roof of a house." plates, extending two feet below the water line, and meeting above like the roof of a r house." This peculiarity of construction may possibly not be necessary to efficiency; but, as a vessel thus built has actually made a great success, it would be worth while fully to examine the principle before constructing any more of our own on the plan already adopted.

The equipment of the Merrimac shows that there are good heads in the Navy Department of the South, and the gallant manner in which shewas handled in action is a token that the Confederate courage is still as high as ever.
