DAILY POST.

From Washington.

A Petition for Colonization.

A memorial to Congress is being numerously signed by colored persons in this District, desiring most respectfully to show for themselves, their relatives and frlends whom they represent, that they appreciate to the full extent the humane actions which are now inaugurated to give freedom to their race; but they believe that this freedom will result injuriously unless there shall be opened to the colored people a region to which they may emigrate: a country which is suited to their organization, and in which they may seek and secure by their own industry that mental and physical development which will allow them an honorable position in the families of God's great world. Though colored people, and debarred from the rights of citizenship, their hearts, they say, none the less cling to the land of their birth. They desire to go to Central America, there to be temporarily protected, so that they may not be wholly excluded from the United States; that they may aid in bringing to us that great commerce of the Pacific which will still further increase the wealth and power of our country.

When Ex-Senator Truman Smith, of Connecticut, returned to Washington with his youthful, accomplished and handsome Alabama wife, some one asked how many slaves she had. "Only one," said Truman, bowing low, and placing his hand upon his heart—"one who is proud to be her slave." That was very good. A correspondent of the New York Herald gives a supplemental anecdote a month later. On the night the platform gave way at the Washington circus, Mr. Smith was present with his young wife, and it is said, when the crash came, he ran for the door, leaving the lady to shift for herself. Another lady observing it, remarked, pointing at the honorable Senator from Connecticut, "Look—look! There goes a fugitive slave!"

England's Naval Supremacy in Danger.

From the London Times, April 4.

The position we hold among the nations of the earth is undoubtedly onerous. It is that of challengers. We must be ready at all times to meet and repel any power upon the seas. Whatever science may conceive or art effect we must be prepared to meet with equal science and at least equal art. If we fall one point below, we are lost. It is our business to keep ahead in this particular work of making the safest and the most destructive engine of warfare that will float. From the earliest times it was our aim to build the best sailing ships and man them with the best sailors. Except during the disgraceful times of our Stuart kings, we succeeded in this object, and our ships were the best and our sailors the most expert in the world. But within our own memory it has been discovered that sailing ships are useless against vessels impelled by steam, and we have started again upon the competition, and formed a steam navy which is superior to any other in the world. Again, the proof has been given that steamships formed of wood are useless against steamships with iron mail, and again it is necessary for us to start upon a new competition, and again to outstrip our rivals. It may be a hardship—no doubt it is a hardship, but it is one forced upon us by the necessity of self-preservation. The condition of our national existence is that we shall be at any given moment in possession of the most effective fleet. We may have to break it up, reconstruct it, turn our sailing ships into steamers, our steamers into ironsides, our ironsides into rams, and our rams, if you please, into electric batteries, or instruments for concentrating sunbeams, or any other wild imagination to which the future may give reality. But, whatever the strongest engine of warfare at any moment may be, of that we ought to have the strongest force. If we cannot afford to do this we cannot afford to keep up our position in the world. It is, in fact, the one thing we have to do. Now, there can be no doubt that at this moment our business in this respect is to have at once, and without allowing to any other nation a moment's start, the greatest force of invulnerable vessels, carrying the heaviest armament which art can produce. All other things are secondary to this. Inland forts may be very excellent things; if so, let us construct them. Outlying forts that will bear the recoil of heavy ordnance that no floating thing could endure, also may have their use, and if they have any use, money will be cheaply spent upon them; but our first and vital necessity is to keep the supremacy of the seas. Before all things we require a sufficiency of iron batteries to be able to cover our coasts in case of sudden quarrel, and, when this has been provided for, we require a fleet of sea-going ironsides which will be able to maintain our empire throughout the globe wherever our flag flies, and to meet any of these novel engines which our enemies may put forth.

SELECT TALE.

A NIGHT ADVENTURE IN PARIS.

It was during the first months of my residence in Paris, in the days of Charles the Tenth, and nearly five-and-thirty years ago. I had been to take a farewell dinner, and a temperate glass or two of Medoc, with a fellow-townsman and neighbor of mine, who was on the point of returning to the paternal roof in Somersetshire. He had been studying medicine and the elements of practical chemistry for the last year, under the watchful eye of his uncle, a pharmacien in the Place Vendome, and it was there, in the small sky-lighted back room behind the shop, which fronted Napoleon's triumphal column, that we had our modest symposium. I was loth to part with him, he had been so true a friend; he it was who examined me with colloquial French—the popular idioms of the Parisian highways; who made me acquainted with all the ins and outs, the byeways and the short cuts of old Lutetia, and taught me how to solve the difficult problem of cutting my coat according to my cloth, which in those days was unfortunately very scanty indeed.

It is not much to be wondered at that I forgot the lapse of time, and that, when at length I screwed myself up to the pitch of saying the last adieus, and had torn myself away, it should be verging to the small hours of the morning. In, truth, it was on the point of striking one when I left the house, and before I had well got clear of the broad "Place" the hour had struck.

At any other time I should not have cared a straw about this, but have walked on quietly to my lodging in the Rue Richelieu; but now I knew that would be of no use. That old concentrated essence of verjuice, Ganache, the porter, to save himself a little trouble, had detained my letters of a morning till I came down, instead of sending them by the garcon to my room on the fourth floor, and I had quarrelled with him in consequence, and given notice to quit at the end of my month. Since our quarrel he had used me savagely, and I knew he was no more likely to let me in after one o'clock than he was to pay my tailor's bill.

This reflection brought me to a standstill. What should I do? Where should I go? To increase my chagrin, it began to rain in a rather sharp shower. Instinctively I faced about, ran across the Place, and got under the shelter of the piazza in the Rue de Castiglione, just in time to save myself from a drenching torrent which burst on the streets like a water-spout. I was walking up and down in the dark, taking counsel of myself, until the storm should cease, when I stumbled and tripped over somebody lying crouched up at the foot of a pillar.

"Is that you, Janin?" said a rather whining voice, which seemed to proceed from some one in the act of waking from sleep.

"No," said I, "it isn't Janin; who are you? and who are you lying here this time of night?"

"Un pauvre aveugle!" said he: "I am waiting here for my comrade; who is gone to the spectacle. You see, M'sieu, Janin is fond of the spectacle, and while he is getting his fill of it, I take my pastime on the cold stones."

I thought it but a grim sort of joke, and told him I should thank better of Janin if he were more considerate for his friend.

The poor blind wretch did not agree with me, and, to my surprise, began vindicating the character of Janin. "You see, M'sieu," said he, "if I am blind, Janin has good eyesight, and why should he not enjoy it? He may as well be blind as I, if he is to see nothing. One should not be selfish although one is unfortunate."

While he was speaking, and I was inwardly admiring his simple magnanimity, Janin came up at a quick pace, and chanting a lively ditty. "What, my old philosopher! so you have company," he said, "I am afraid I must disturb your conference."

"Make no apology for that, I pray," said I, "but if you can direct me to a lodging I shall be obliged."

"You are English," said Janin: "there is an English house in the Rue de l'Odeon, which is always open till two. If you make for the Pont Neuf at once, and step out, you will be there in good time."

"Good night, then, my lads." And away I trudged at a round pace for the Pont Neuf—crossed it in a pelting shower, and made the best of my way to the Rue de l'Odeon. I accounted myself fortunate in reaching the house a few minutes before the hour for closing the door, but found that I had not so much cause for congratulation as I had imagined, as the place was full, and the only accommodation the landlady could offer was a small truckle-bed in a two bedded room, already bespoken for the night by a previous comer.

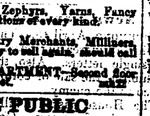
TO THE PUBLIC



ESPECIALLY to the ignorant and unfortunately Modest of all denominations, treat secret and delicate diseases, the result of abuse and disease, or the exposed situations common and incident to youths of both sexes, and adults, single or married. Because DR. BRANSTUR publishes the fact of his doing so, the ignorant and falsely modest shall not be doubtfully shocked, and think it a great sin very immoral and far contamination and corruption among their wives, prostrating sons and daughters. Public family physicians should be cautious to keep them in ignorance that they do the same as Dr. BRANSTUR, (except the publishing) and in a private practice might be lost to Society, many a fine, modest and professional families, born and raised in ignorance, serving as a monument and who compare society. Infallible remedy, for to dollars and cents, myself-only, only to be gotten. It is to publicity, however, that numerous parents and guardians owe the preservation of sons, daughters and wards, who, but for timely and judicious counsel, would have fallen victims to the many snares and temptations of this life. Secret diseases, and all other kinds of foreign and domestic origin, treated with success.
