ne closed the door and desce_ded the steps. I was somewhat annoyed at the appearance of things, and determined to place myself in the best possible position of defense. I examined my quarters closely, and found the door had no fastening, whatever, nor was anything convenient with which it could be secured.

Determined not to be baffled, I tore a piece of board from the wall, and with my knife cut a piece sufficiently long to make a brace from the lower cleat of the door to the floor. Then with my pocket knife I bored holes in the upper end, and drawing several nails from the wall, I drove them in with the handle of my large knife.

Having examined the walls and apprehending no treachery from them, I secured the window, and then turned my attention to the floor. Beneath the bed I discovered a trap door, and its discovery made my hair stand on end. I found it opened downward, and the possibility of securing it strongly seemed hopeless.

Once I thought of removing the bed, and the watching as a trapper does a hole in the ice for game. But that would not do.

Once I thought of removing the bed, and then watching as a trapper does a hole in the ice for game. But that would not do, for should I successfully repel the first intruder—for I no longer had a doubt of being in a Bobber's Roost—it would leave to being in a Bobber's Roost—it would leave to their fire. At length a plan came to my relief. I moved the bed from over the door, and taking the clothes of, I threw the chaff bed upon the floor, and taking the clothes of, I threw the chaff bed upon the floor, and timest—ly over the suspected trap. But, Ohl horror: what a discovery is made. The bed was saturated with bleed, and in many places hard from the gore which had dried in it.
