Thursday, Friday and Saturday were re-moved to Savage's Station, where the man-sion, negro quarters and outbuildings af forded them an imperfect shelter. A great number of hospital tents had been pitched in the adjacent orchard and fields, and these provided further accommodations for a large number of the sufferers. Blankets, boards and carvas covered all the sur-rounding space, and those who could not be laid in the tents were stretched upon these in the open air. There was neces-sarily much pain endured by the unfortn-nates, as the falling back of the army in-volved things in confusion, and the few surgeons remaining had neither the ap-purtenances nor the lopportunities to ply their avocation. The battle of Peach Orchard, on Sunday, largely increased the number of patients. In the afternoon the battle to the left of Savage's com-menced, and the rebels, either not per-ceiving or disregarding our hospital flag, fired the first three shells directly into the surgeons volunteered to take a flag of the surgeons volunteered, signed by three rebel colonels, promising not to assail the hospital, unless unfair advantage was truce to the enemy. It was received by them, and a note returned, signed by three rebel colonels, promising not to assail the hospital, unless unfair advantage was taken by our army. The battle raged till nine o'clock in the evening, the wounded being constantly brought into Savage's, and under cover of night our troops re-tired, leaving detachments to bring the wounded from the field, who continued at their labor till one o clock on Monday morning. At davlight the enemy's pickets came
