"But in scanning this question in the light of fiitteen months' experience an un-looked for feature presents itself. There is not that readiness on the part of the slave population to separate from their masters and their plantations as was anticipated. The mass of the slaves, if they thirst for freedom, do not rush as to the fountain when under the proclamations of our Gov-ernment and our Generals it is offered, as was expected. Either through fear of con-sequences in the effort to escape or of not being well recieved when they enter our lines, the number of fugitives is small and escapes from bondage less frequent as the war progresses.
