Urged by their riders to the top of their speed, the hardy, unshod little mustangs of our enemies scrambled after us over the dangerous trail with a cat-like condition of hold not possessed by our own facility of hold not possessed by our own cattle. To add to our embarrassment, our third horse began to show a desire to stray from the trail, and forced us often to lose ground by swerving to head him back again. In fact, it was all we could do to ho own, and, desperate as our desperate need required it, we pushed on. The steep moun-tain side, the other day painfully ascend-ed, was now dashed furiously down, the edge of the precipice, usually traversed so gingerly, was spurred ficrcely over, unheed-ing the appeals of our terrified horses, who quivered and snorted in very fear. Without drawing bridle, we spattered through the mountain torrent that ran down the deep gulches, and took flying the smaller streams.
