Our theological neighbor, the Gazette. quotes this paragraph and comments upon it as follows:

"What is the "great transgression" here spoken of? Is it for pride, vainglory, arrogance, self-sufficiency—or is it for Mammon-worship, fraud, corruption, profanity, drunkenness, Sabbath-breaking. All these we are guilty of, as are most nations. But does any person believe that it is for these things God is now visiting us?

Does not every man instinctively turn to something else for the "great transgression." Is there a single man of any information who does not believe that the sin which has called down God's just judgments is that of slavery—a sin in which has whole patient has well as the state of the whole patients has mean as he was the state of the whole patients has mean as he was the state of the whole patients has mean as he was the state of the whole patients has mean as he was the state of the state of

Besides, the men has the following: expect to own a slave. Besides, the men like Washington, Jefferson, Adams and Henry, and their compatriots, who framed our institutions, did not look upon holding slaves with the same enormity which is characteristic of some philanthropists of the present day. In fact New England, itself, saw nothing to incur "the judgment of God," for she trafficed in slaves until the trade grew unprofitable; most probable, but it is not likely that any like

The slaveholder, indeed, here, where there are no slaves, it must be for something else. Suppose then we accept it as a chestisement for the other offenses, enumerated by the Gazette, as well as for the single one of slavery. Let may be now undergoing his punishment; us add some other sins to the Gazette's list, not uncommon among men who are connot uncommon among men who are constantly lamenting the existence of slavery; and small lamenting the existence of slavery; we mean "oppression of the poor;" or defrauding honest labor of its earnings; or failing to comfort the orphan and the widow, made such by this rebellion. As there was a rumor circulating through the city that the rebel Jackson had crossed over into Maryland at "Point of Rocks." on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, we called upon the efficient and vigilent agent of that road, J. B. Ford, Esq., and was politely informed that such, at that time, was not the case; and, as an assurance of the truth of the matter, he informed us that the trains would start for the city of Baltimore this morning, as usual. It was in the last few weeks. He believes within the last few weeks. He believes the table to be the route travelled by the route travelled b Baltimore this morning, as usual. A number of companies are now in process of formation in several of the wards, boroughs and townships, and by the close of the week we shall doubtless have an organization quite as formidable in point of numbers as the old Home Guard.
