RHEUMATISM.

Dr. Brown's remedies never fail to cure this painful disease IN A FEW DAYS—he will warrant a cure. He also treats Piles, Gleet, Gonorrhœa Stricture, Urethal Discharges, Female Weakness Monthly Suppressions, Diseases of the Joints, Fistula in Ano, Nervous Affections, Pains in the Back and Kidneys, Irritation of the Bladder, together with all diseases of an impure origin.

A letter describing the symptoms, containing a fee, directed to DR. BROWN, No. 80 Smithfield St., Pittsburgh, Pa., will be immediately answered. Medicine sent to any address, safely packed and secure from observation.

SELECT TALE.

MARRIED BY COMMAND,

Once upon a time there lived near the fort of Marienburg, in Prussia, a farmer of the name of Reiwal. He had two daughters—charming girls. The two daughters were in love, and engaged to be married to two soldiers—one each, of course. Brothers they were, and as strapping fellows as ever Great Frederick could wish to see. It was expected that the regiment in which the brothers served would soon be at a neighboring fortress: and then the marriage would take place.

Charlette, the younger sister, was sitting on the day in question, busily employed in knitting, while watching her father's goats, when an old gentleman, of noble and majestic carriage, stopped before her. He held a cane in his hand, and wore a military hat and boots, and a great coat with a large cape.

The young shepherdess had never seen this gentleman before, and his presence—she knew not why—inspired her with a feeling of awe. After regarding, for some time with an arch smile, he thus addressed her:

"What is your name, my pretty miss?"

"Charlette Reiwal, at your service," replied she.

"At my service! Well perhaps I may require your service. How old are you, now?"

"Eighteen at Candlemas."

"What is your occupation?"

"I am shepherdess to my parents, who are farmers in the valley."

"You are not married?"

"Not yet."

"Have you a dowry?"

"I do not know."

"Well, here is something towards one, if you will serve me as you promised to do just now," he said, placing in her unwilling hand a purse containing two hundred florins.

So strange did this proceeding appear to the simple and timid shepherdess, that she was quite alarmed: and, believing this fine gentleman to be a sorcerer, his gold seemed to burn her fingers. In the meanime the stranger had taken a note-book from his pocket and had written a few words on a sheet of paper, which he carefully sealed.

"To gain two hundred florins," said he, "you have only to carry this letter to the fort of Marienburg. If you show this seal all the guards will let you pass. You must ask for Major Keller, the commander, and give the letter into his hands. Do you understand, and promise to do what I told you?"

Charlotte wished to reply in the negative, but to refuse seemed to her even more difficult than to accept: so that, not knowing what to say, she was silent, and the stranger, concluding that her silence gave assent, left her the letter and the purse.

When he was out of sight, the terror-stricken girl ran to her sister, and related her adventure.

Catherine was the very reverse of her timid, gentle sister. She was a fine, independent, spirited girl, who would go through anything to gain her end; she liked nothing better than a mystery and even danger had a charm for her.

"A commission for Marienburg!" exclaimed she, "it is a God-send. Call him a good angel, rather than a demon, who brought it. Our betrothed, the sergeants Albert and Ludwig Hosten, have been on the march for the fortress the last three days. By these means we may obtain news of them, and perhaps even see them to-day. What a surprise for them, and what joy for us! to say nothing about the two hundred florins, which are not to be picked up every day."

Saying these words, she took the purse: and turning the precious letter first to one side and then on the other, she called upon Charlotte in the name of their betrothed, to go immediately to the fort, while she took care of the goats.

"Never!" replied Charlotte; "I shall never have courage. If you go in my stead, I will make over the two hundred florins to you."

"I will accept half," replied Catherine, quickly, "we shall thus both have a dowry, and—who knows?—perhaps be married to-morrow."

Letter in hand, Catherine soon reached the fortress, the gates of which were opened to her at the sight of the mysterious seal. She was much pleased with the deference which was paid her, and made up her mind that the stranger must have been some great personage, and that the letter contained something important. She examined it over and over again, burning with curiosity to know the contents—She endeavored to peep into the envelope, but in vain. "If I should," without knowing it, cause a coup d'etat, or a revolution!" exclaimed she. "But after all, what are the secrets of peace and war to me. The great thing is to ascertain if Albert and Ludwig are here."

The commander, a crabbed-looking old soldier, who had grown grey in the service of his king and country, now entered to relieve her suspense. Having eyed her from head to foot, he said:

"One of the fair sex asked for me. It was you, young girl. Here I am. What can I do for you?"

"Is it Major Keller, commander at Marienburg, to whom I have the honer of speaking?"

"The same."

"I am commisioned to give this letter into your hands, major," said Catharine, presenting the letter.

"From whom did you receive it?" continued he.

"From a stranger who passed down the road about an hour ago."

"Let me see," he said, starting as he recognized the seal, and taking off his hat, he made a military salute.

Catharine was quite astonished to find that the despatch of which she was the bearer received as much honor as herself.

Having read the letter, Keller burst into a sudden fit of laughter, and then as suddenly grew grave again, and, taking out a double eye-glass, silently regarded her for some time.

"Would you like to be a Vivandier?" asked the determined mejor.

"Vivandier? That would depend on the Regiment. If it were, for instance, in the third——."

"What is your dowry?" interrupted the the major.

Catharine, thinking the major's question very original, and wondering what he would say next, answered, "Not a large sume—one hundred gold florins; the carriage of the letter which I have given you."

"Well, that is a dowry for a soldier."

"Certianly—especially for a sergeant."

"But you have not told me if the fifth company of the third regiment——"

"Yes, yes; we will see about that." It is a company of picked men, measuring five feet six inches; I doubt if your finger——. Permit, me mademoiselle," said he, drawing his sword, and taking her measure with the blade.

"Five feet at least. Not amiss, not amiss!"

"Major, do you wish to enroll me in the king's army?" exclaimed she.

"It is already done, my darling. have but to choose the corps, and I think you will belong to the Grenadiers."
