SELECT TALE.

NAPOLEON AT THE FIRESIDE.

Nine o'clock had just struck at the imperial palace at Fontainbleau. Napoleon, seated by the fireside with Marie Louise, was enjoying that freedom of conversation and familiarity he was so fond of. Never had his noble and antique features assumed so joyous and so natural an expression. He laughed, he chatted, he joked; and a stranger, entering by chance, would have had much difficulty in recognizing the emperor in that little, stout man, lolling with so much nonchalance in an arm-chair. He poked the fire with the tip of his boot, he rubbed his hands with glee, and tender sallies provoked Marie Louise to venture upon some French phrases, as yet strange to her, which she disfigured with a German frankness so irresistibly droll that Napoleon burst into fits of laughter. The empress, half angry, half smiling, came and sat upon the knee of her husband. At the same moment, the door opening, the soldier-like face of Duroc presented itself.

"Sire," said he, "the Italian artist has arrived."

"Conduct him here, immediately," replied the emperor at the same time, pushing back his arm chair, he left a space for the new comer between the empress and himself.

The visitor, on entering, made a profound bow to the illustrous personages into whose presence he was admitted; and, at the desire of Napoleon, took a seat near the fire.

"Welcome to France, my dear Canova," said the emperor, in one of his kindest accents. "But how pale and thin you have become since I last saw you. You must certainly leave Rome and come to reside in Paris. The air of the capital will restore you to health and vigor. See how well we are," said he, taking in his hand the fresh and rosy looking chin of Marie Louise.

"Sire, you must attribute my ill-health to the fatigue of my occupations, not to the air of my country. To leave home altogether would be impossible for me; indeed it would be fatal for me."

"Paris is the capital of arts. You must stay here; I desire it," said the husband of the empress, in a commanding tone, on a sudden assuming the emperor.

"Your majesty may dispose of my life; but if you wish it to be devoted to your service, sire, grant me permission to return to Italy as soon as I have finished the bust of her majesty, the empress, which I am about to undertake."

"Devil's in the man, he refuses to remain with me! You see, Louise, he has no other ambition than to be the greatest sculptor in the world. He longs to leave us to return to Rome to resume his labors, and to present to the world another such work as his 'Terpsichore,' 'Paris,' 'Les Danseuses,' or the 'Madgalen.'

The conversation then became more general; they talked of the 'Excavation' continued by the Borghese family of Italian artists, of the 'Colonne Vendome,' and a thousand other topics. Nothing was new to Napoleon, who conversed with a perfect knowledge of every subject, and a wonderful clearness of perception. Canova could not retain his surprise and admiration.

"How is it possible for your majesty to divide your attention between so many different matters?" exclaimed he.

"I have sixty million of subjects," replied Napoleon, with a smile; "eight or nine hundred thousand soldiers, a hundred thousand horses. The Romans, themselves, had not so many; I have commanded at forty battles. At Wagram I fired a hundred thousand cannon-balls, and this lady, who was then archduchess of Austria, desired my death." At this he pulled the ear of Marie Louise, who answered, with a droll imitation of her German accent, Il etre bien vrai.'

"I think" said the artist, "things now wear a different aspect."

"Oh! Cele est bien vraia," said Marie Louise, this time in the best French possible, kissing the emperor's hand tenderly, who, taking the young creature by the waist, made her sit upon his lap, but she blushingly resisted, 'Bah! bah!' said Napoleon; "Canova is a friend, and we do not make ceremonies with friends; besides, he is himself of a tender and susceptible nature, and will be delighted to witness the happiness of an affectionate couple."

"Listen to me, Louise, and I will relate to you a romantic story, the hero of which you may easily guess. You will then judge if those who love each other ought to feel any restraint in the presence of Canova."

He kissed Marie Louise, and, keeping her still upon his knee, began:—"In the province of Treviso there is a little village called Possagno. In this little place was born and reared the son of an architect, whose father died at the early age of thirty-seven, and whose mother married a second time.

"At four years old, the child, by name Antonio, was entrusted to the care of its grandfather, who, treated it with much severity. By him it was sent to pass an autumn at Padrazzi, two or three leagues from Possagno, at the house of an Italian senator, a friend of his, whose name was Faliero. The latter, observing the intelligence of the little peasant, and pleased with the ability he evinced in carving stone and shaping clay, placed him as a pupil with a clever sculptor called Toretto.'

"What! your majesty knows all these minute details of my private life?,' exclaimed Canova, in surprise.

"I know many more,' replied Napoleon; and he continued:

"Torretto was a man of strict morals, but, however narrowly he may have watched his favorite pupil, Antonio found means to escape from the atelier, now and then, to go and dance at the village fetes. He was then only sixteen. Amongst the gay throng of peasants assembled together during the vintage, to dance the tarantolla, there was one whose charms captivated his heart—Bettina Biasi. She was just fourteen. Her large black eyes sparkled with animation; her waist was so tapering that two hands could span it; her hair the loveliest that ever adorned a maiden.'

A sigh escaped from the bosom of Canova. The emperor pressed the hand of Marie Louise, that she might remark that sigh, and without interrupting his recital, continued:

"Antonio was enthusiastic and in love. As for the grandfather, he was much less moved by the fascinations, than by the marriage portion of Bettina, which was considerable, particularly for the poor apprentice to a sculptor. The parents of both formed their projects of uniting them; arrangements for their marriage were drawing to a close when Torretto and the Senator chanced to hear it. They reflected that this union would destroy the prospects of their protege, and determined to prevent it. One evening they entered the chamber of Antonio, commanded him to follow them, and, notwithstanding his tears, his resistance and despair, carried him to Venice, where they confined him during a whole year. All endeavors to escape proved fruitless. The enamoured youth, finding his return to Padrazzi impossible, was compelled to seek consolation in the study of his favorite pursuit—sculpture. The talent and reputation of the young man soon spread abroad; his celebrity was established—he became rich—his society was courted by all, and the memory of Bettina Biasi was gradually erased from his mind. At the same time the arts and blandishments of another little coquette, Dominica, took the place in his affections. She was the daughter of the sculptor, Volpata. Proposals of marriage were made; but as Dominica was yet young, a postponement was agreed upon till the following year. Alas! before that time, Dominica bestowed her hand on Raphael Morghen. The poor deserted lover was in despair at this new piece of treachery.'

At this part of the recital, Canova fell into a deep fit of musing and melancholy, unconscious of what was passing around him.

"His health gave way. His physician and his friends recommended him to return and breathe the air of his native village. (Were Corvisart here, he would say this was a remedy the faculty do not believe in, but nevertheless it always succeeds.) Antonio set off on his journey.—On his approach to his native place, the thought of Bettina Biasi—that charming, that lovely girl so disinterested in her love for him—rushed upon his imagination more engaging than ever. 'O,' cried he, 'how ungrateful have I been to neglect and forget her.' Dismissing from his mind all remembrance of Dominica, he dreamed only of Bettina Biasi. He pictured himself the delight he should experience in again clasping her to his bosom. His heart beat with hope and joy, and whilst he was resolving within himself to proceed the next day without fail to Padrazzi, he perceived the village spire of Possagno before him. Too much agitated to remain in the slow 'vetturina,' he alighted and continued his journey on foot by a short road, until he arrived at the gate of the little town. At this moment a crowd of young men who were awaiting his arrival, perceiving him approach, filled the air with shouts of welcome, and surrounded and embraced him. He stands without the power of speech, his heart throbs within him, his eyes are filled with tears. The road is strewed with laurel branches and evergreens; all the inhabitants of Possagno—women, children and old men in holiday costume—line the road, and salute the celebrated youth. The venerable Toretto, the old master of Canova, folds him in his arms, weeping over him. At a distant approach the mother of Canova, his step-father, and behind them a female bathed in tears. 'Bettina! Bettina!' cried Canova. She stretches out her hand to him, he is about to speak, when the bells of the village sound a merry peal, salvos of musketry rend the air, and the curate at the head of his clergy, singing the 'Te Deum,' advances in his clerical robes, kneels down, and returns thanks to Providence for having granted to Possagno a child so renowned as Canova. The aged priest then passes his arm through that of Canova, his mother leans on the other, and the procession conducts the hero in triumph to his grandfather, whose infirmities confine him to his house.

"Ah! sire, sire! let me entreat you not to continue a recital which awakens such cruel and such sweet recollections," interrupted Canova, sobbing.

But Napoleon was too much pleased with the impression he had made on his listeners to think of stopping. Marie Louise had several times wiped the tears from her eyes.

"Listen to the rest," resumed he, addressing the empress, "we are coming to the denouement, which is well worthy of the rest of the story. The day following, as Canova was entering the garden of his grandfather, he saw Bettina Biasi approaching him. Five years had diminished none of her beauty, except that she was pale, and resembled one of his own white marble statues. 'O, Bettina, Bettina!' cried he, 'will you not pardon my ingratitude, and confer on me a happiness I scarcely deserve? I had not yet seen you when all the fervent and tender affection I once bore you returned upon me with increased strength.' 'Listen!' said Bettina, whose voice trembled with emotion, 'listen! Antonio mio—I suffered much when I learnt that you were to be married to Dominica; but I felt, even then, dearest friend, that the humble village girl of Padrazzi, the daughter of a peasant; the affianced of the apprentice Antonio, could never be the wife of Canova. Nevertheless, I refused several offers of marriage, and for five years I lived upon the recollection of him I loved. But when I heard that you were about to return to Possagno—when I concluded, from my own feelings, that you would not be able to see me again without emotion—when I reflected that we might both be weak enough to renew intimacies rendered unreasonable by your present position, I was anxious to save us both, not only the possibility of yielding, but also the agitation and struggles we would have to undergo—I married.' 'Married—you married!' 'About eight days ago, to a deserving young man, who has sought my hand for four years.'''

"Oh! that was a noble and worthy creature!" cried Marie Louise.

Canova had left his seat, and had gone to lean his head against the window, to conceal his grief. A knock came to the door, and the Minister of Police, the Duc d'Otrante, put in his plain, but expressive head.

"Really, M. le Duc, you could not have arrived at a more opportune moment. See the effect I have produced, thanks to the information you have procured me from Italy within the last few days."

"Adieu, Canova," continued he, gently patting the shoulder of the artist. "Employ yourself in making the bust of my wife, and, when you have finished it, if you still persist in returning to Italy, I suppose we must let you go."

"Good night! I have business with M. le Duc d'Otrante. Ah! it is a hard life, that of an emperor,' said he. 'It is not often I have an evening to myself and friend; near the fire.'

"Now come, M. le Duc.' And he went out with the minister.

We must not omit to add, that this was the evening of the 11th October, 1810, and that the emperor, Marie Louise, and Canova, were in the same room, and near the same fireplace where Napoleon signed his abdication, 11th of April, 1814.

The New Correspondent.

A good deal of curiosity is felt as to the authorship of the letters from Richmond in the London Times, which have painted the slaveholding chivalry in such romantic colors, and have done such full justice to their sordid and cowardly antagonists. We are credibly informed that the writer is neither John Mitchel nor Mr. Yancey, as has been suggested, but is no less a personage than the celebrated Mr. Arrowsmith, whose extraordinary correspondence with the Times excited such general attention a few years ago, and who is so well qualified, by his habits of accurate observation and strict regard for truth, to furnish Mr. Bull with an acceptable account of the state of things in this country.—N. Y. Post.

The Freedom of the Negro Incompatible With the Liberty of the White Man.

The Abolitionists push their mad schemes, not only regardless of the consequences to the Union, but utterly regardless of the effect upon the white race of the country, or the fate of the negro. Henry Clay said, in the Senate, on the 9th of February, 1839:

"I am, Mr. President, no friend of slavery. The Searcher of all hearts knows that every pulsation of mine beats high and strong in the cause of civil liberty. Wherever it is safe and practicable, I desire to see every member of the human family in the enjoyment of it. But I prefer the liberty of my own race to that of any other race. The liberty of the descendants of Africa, in the United States, is incompatible with the liberty and safety of the European descendants. Their slavery forms an exception, resulting from stern and inexorable necessity, to the general liberty in the United States. We did not originate nor are we responsible for this necessity. Their liberty, if it were possible, could only be established by violating the incontestible powers of the States, and in subverting the Union. And beneath the ruins of the Union would be buried, sooner or later, the liberty of both races."

Here is what De Tocqueville, author of "Democracy in America," says on the subject:

"Hitherto, wherever the whites have been the strongest, they have maintained the blacks in a subordinate and servile position; wherever the negroes have been the strongest, they have destroyed the whites. Such has been the only retribution that has ever taken place between the two races."

TEETH EXTRACTED WITHOUT PAIN by the use of an apparatus whereby no drugs or galvanic battery are used. Medical gentlemen and their families have their teeth extracted by my process, and are ready to testify as to the safety and painlessness of the operation, whatever has been said by persons interested in asserting the contrary, having no knowledge of my process.

☞ ARTIFICIAL TEETH inserted in every style, and charges as low, as will warrant the best of material in all cases.
