A Ghost Story A gentleman took a fancy to a certain legant villa in a charming part of one of the lovliest counties in England. On inuiring about the rent it seemed to him so extraordinarily low that the objected to take PIANOS & HELODEONS it, suspecting that there must be something tain the message of Gov. Vance, which is radically wrong in the building. The provery lengthy and betrays nothing like a prietor assured him that there was nothing Union sentiment. He appeals to a stern, of the kind, but informed him that the ob determined devotion to the cause which jection in the neighborhood to the villa can alone sustain a revolution. Heeve was that it had the reputation of beflects severely upon the Confederate ing haunted. He laughed at the vuglar conscription law, and bitterly denounces superstitution, and at once accepted the the spirit of speculation which pervades terms and moved into the cottage. He the States, and says that flour and corn was not very long in it before his domes can now be used by the rich. The North tics informed him of strange noises which they had repeatedly heard in the night.— They had distinctly listened to the open-ing of doors. Another door was then opened, water was poured out, and the sound of washing hands was unmistakingly audible. After a short time the window was opened and the water was thrown out; the window was closed, and, shortly after, steps were heard descending, and the house door opened and closed. This, the servants declared, they had severally and collectively listened to numerous times. collectively listened to numerous times.
