Washington's Birthday in Brooklyn.

Exercises at the Athenæum—General M'Clellan Present—He is greeted by the People as the next President of the United States—His modest Demeanor, &c.

The anniversary of Washington's birthday was celebrated at the Brooklyn Athenæum on Sunday evening by the Rev. Matthew Hale Smith and his congregation. It having become known that General M'Clellan had been invited and would be present on the occasion, the building was crowded from floor to ceiling by a highly fashionable audience, the majority of whom had braved the fearful inclemency of the evening in order to pay a tribute of respect to the idol of the people. The stage of the Athenæum was tastefully draped by a superabundance of national bunting, a beautiful painting of Washington adorning the background. A stall, fitted up specially for General McClellan, was likewise decorated in a most elegant manner by red, white and blue stripes, artistically intertwined. Shortly before half-past seven o'clock Rev. Mr. Smith appeared before the audience and announced that General McClellan, who was in the ante-room, had expressly requested that no public recognition of his presence might be made by the audience, as he wished to be present in as private a manner as possible during the exercises. Mr. Smith suggested that the audience should simply rise when the General would enter, and remain standing until he took his seat, and that after the exercises they would have an opportunity of paying their respects to him, only they should not shake his hands, which had already been made lame by the process.

Gen. McClellan soon after that entered, accompanied by Alderman Douglas and Mr. Trufton, and was received by the audience as they were directed, but it was evident that the work of keeping down their outspoken enthusiasm went very hard with a large number, and suppressed applause forced itself out several times.

The exercises were opened by prayer and the singing of some patriotic music, commencing as follows:

Pray on the field of battle;
God works with those who pray.
His mighty arm can nerve us,
And make us win the day.
Pray! Pray! Pray! Pray!
On the field of battle.

After some further singing and religious exercises, the pastor proceeded to deliver an oration, entitled "The Voice of Washington to the Nation." The orator spoke at length of the character and noble qualities of the Father of his Country, and was listened to attentively throughout.

After a collection and some further singing, the exercises closed with a benediction, and a regular siege was laid to the General by the audience, many of whom insisted on shaking his hand, notwithstanding the warning they had received. The General bore the pressure very good naturedly, but at length he was compelled to raise the siege and make his exit from the building. On getting outside, a new scene awaited him. The heavily descending snow did not prevent the people of the sister city from exposing themselves to the fleecy influence of that god of winter, in order to do homage to their distinguished visitor. "It was with difficulty that Gen. McClellan could get within several yards of his carriage, so great was the importunity of the crowd; and, when at length he succeeded in entering the vehicle, loud cheers were given for him, as "Our next President of the United States," and, with this music ringing in his ears, he was driven away towards New York.

AMONG THE MANY ANNOYANCES to which housekeepers are subjected, is one more mendurable than any others, the ravages of vermin. The nibbling of rats, and the disgusting presence of roaches in the larder is the detestation of all good housekeepers. It must, therefore, be a desideratum with all to obtain something which will effectually rid our dwellings of these filthy creatures. And all can be gratified. The Rat Killer prepared by Geo. A. Kelly is believed to be the thing desired. It is sure destruction to Rats and Roaches, and at the same time will not cause death to other animals. One box judiciously used is sufficient to rid a house of all the vermin that infest it. Full direction for use accompanying each box. Price 25 cents per box. For sale by Druggists generally, and by the Proprietor, wholesale or retail.

SELECT TALE.

A ROGUE'S LIFE.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

Just then I thought I heard a footsteps in front of the house, but, listening more attentively, found that it had begun to rain, and that I had been deceived by the pattering of the first heavy drops against the windows. However, the bare suspicion that the same stranger who had called already might be watching the house now, was enough to suggest the absolute necessity of occupying no more precious time in paying attention to the vagaries of Mrs. Braggs' nerves. It was also of some importance that I should speak to her while she was sober enough to understand what I meant in a general way. Feeling convinced that she was in imminent danger of becoming downright drunk, if I gave her another glass, I kept my hand on the bottle, and forthwith told my story over again, in a very abridged and unceremonious form and without allowing her one moment of leisure for comment on my narrative, whether it might be of the weeping, winking, drinking, groaning or ejaculating kind. As I had anticipated, when I came to the conclusion, and consequently allowed her an opportunity of saying a few words, she affected to be extremely surprised and shocked at hearing of the nature of her master's pursuits, and reproached me in terms of the most vehement and virtuous indignation for incurring the guilt of abetting them, even though I had done so from the very excusable motive of saving my own life. Having a lively sense of the humorous, I was necessarily rather amused by this; but I began to get a little surprised as well, when I diverged to the to the Doctor's escape, on finding that Mrs. Baggs viewed the fact of his running away to some hiding-place of his own in the light of a personal insult to his faithful and fondly-attached house-keeper.

"It shows a want of confidence in me," said the old lady, "which I may forgive, but can never forget. The sacrifice I have made for that ungrateful man are not to be told in words. The very morning he sent me here, what did I do? Packed up the very moment he said. Go. I had my preserves to pot, and the kitchen chimney to be swept, and the lock of my box hampered into the bargain. Other women in my place would have grumbled —I got up directly, as lively as any girl of eighteen you like to mention. Says he, I want Laura taken out of young Softly's way, and you must do it.'—Says I, 'This very morning, sir?'—Says he, 'This very morning.'—Says I, 'Where to?'

Says he, 'as far off as ever you can go; coast of Wales—Crickgelly. I won't trust her nearer; young Softly's too cunning, and she's too fond of him.'—'Any more orders, sir?'—Yes; take some fancy name—Simpkins, Johnson, Giles, Jones, James,' says he, 'what you like but Knapton; for that scamp, Softly, will move heaven and earth to trace her.'—'What else?' says I.—'Nothing but look sharp,' says he. 'And mind one thing that she sees no visitors, and posts no letters.'—Before these last words were out of his lips an hour, we were on our road to get her away—a nice job to stop her from writing letters to you—a nice job to keep her here. But I did it; I followed my orders like a slave on a plantation with a whip at his bare back. I've had rheumatics, weak legs, bad nights, and Miss Laura in the sulks—all from obeying the doctor's orders. And what is my reward? He turns coiner, and runs away without a word to me beforehand, and writes me a trumpery note, without a date to it, without a farthing of money in it, telling me nothing! Look at my confidence in him, then look at the way he has treated me in return. What woman's nerves can stand this? Don't keep fidgeting with the bottle! Pass it this way, Mr. Softly, or you will break it, and that will drive me distracted."

"He has no excuse, ma'am," I said.—"But will you allow me to change the subject, as I am pressed for time? You appear to be so well acquainted with the favorable opinion which Miss Laura and I entertain of each other, that I hope it will be no fresh shock to your nerves if I inform you, in plain words, that I have come to Crickgelly to marry her."

"Marry her! marry——— If you don't leave off fidgeting with the bottle, Mr. Softly, and change the subject directly, I shall ring the bell."

"Hear me out, madam, and then ring if you like. If you persist, however, in considering yourself still the confidential servant of a felon who is now flying for his life, and if you decline allowing the young lady to act as she wishes, I will not be so rude as to hint that—as she is of age —she may walk out of this house with me whenever she likes, without you having power to prevent her; but, I will politely ask, instead, what you would propose to do with her, in the straightened position as to money in which she and you are likely to be placed? You can't find her father to give her to; and, if you could, who would be the best protector for her? The doctor, who is the principal criminal in the eye of the law, or I, who am only the unwilling accomplice? He is known to the Bow Street runners—I am not. There is a reward for taking him, and none for taking me. He has no respectful relatives and friends, I have plenty. Every way my chances are the best; and consequently I am in every way the fittest person to trust Laura to. Don't you think I am?"

Mrs. Baggs did not answer immediately. She snatched the bottle out of my hands—drank off another dram shook her head at me, and ejaculated lamentably. "My nerves, my nerves! what a heart of stone he must have to presume so on my poor nerves!"

"Give me one minute more," I went on. "I propose to take you and Laura tomorrow to Scotland. Pray don't groan! I only suggest the journey with a matrimonial object. In Scotland, Mrs. Baggs, if a man and woman accept one another as husband and wife, before one witness, it is a lawful marriage; and that kind of weddings is, as you must see plainly enough, the only refuge for a bridegroom in my situation. If you consent to come with us to Scotland, and serve as a witness to the marriage, I shall be delighted to acknowledge my sense of your kindness in the eloquent language of the Bank of England, as expressed to the world, in general, on the surface of a five pound note."

I cautiously snatched away the brandy bottle as I spoke, and was in the drawing-room with it in an instant. I suppose Mrs. Baggs tried to follow me; for I heard the door rattle, as if she had got out of her chair, and suddenly slipped back into it again. I felt certain of her deciding to help us, if she was only sober enough to reflect on what I had said to her. The journey to Scotland was a tedious, and perhaps a dangerous, undertaking. But I had no other alternative to choose. In those uncivilized days, the Marriage Act had not been passed, and there was no convenient registrar in England to change a vagabond runaway couple into a respectable man and wife at a moment's notice. The trouble and expense of taking Mrs. Baggs with me, I encountered, of course, solely out of regard for Laura's national prejudices. She had led precisely that kind of life which makes any woman but a bad one morbidly sensitive on the subject of small proprieties. If she had been a girl with a recognized position in society I should have proposed to her to run away with me alone. As it was, the very defencelessness of her situation gave her, in my opinion, the right to expect from me even the absurdest sacrifices to the narrowest conventionalities. Mrs. Baggs was not quite so sober in her habits, perhaps, as matrons in general are expected to be; but for my particular purpose this was only a blemish; it takes so little, after all, to represent the abstract principle of propriety in the short-sighted eyes of the world.

As I reached the drawing-room door, I looked at my watch. Nine o'clock! and nothing done yet to facilitate our escaping from Crickgelly to the regions of civilized life the next morning. I was pleased to hear, when I knocked at the door, that Laura's voice sounded firmer as she told me to come in. She was more confused than astonished or frightened when I sat down by her on the sofa, and repeated the principal part of my conversation with Mrs. Baggs.

"Now, my love," said I, in conclusion—suiting my gestures, it is unnecessary to say, to the tenderness of my proposals—"there is not the least doubt that Mrs. Baggs will end by agreeing to my proposals. Nothing remains, therefore, but for you to give me the answer now, which I have been waiting for ever since that last day we met by the river-side. I did not know then what the motive was for your silence and distress. I know now, and I love you better after that knowledge than I did before it."

Her head dropped into its former position on my bosom, and she murmured a few words, but too faintly for me to hear them.

"You knew more about your father, then, than I did?" I asked.

"Less than you have told me since," she interposed quickly, without raising her face.

"Enough to convince you that he was breaking the laws," I suggested; "and to make you, as his daughter, shrink honorably from saying Yes to me when we sat together on the river bank."

She did not answer; but one of her arms, which was hanging over my shoulder, stole round my neck and clasped it gently.

"Since that time," I went on, "your father has compromised me, I am in some danger, not much, from the law.—I have no prospects that are not of the most doubtful kind; and I have no excuse for asking you to share them, except that I have fallen into my present misfortune through trying to discover and remove the obstacle that kept us apart. If I had not loved you better than every other interest of my life, I should never have tried to contend with that obstacle. If there is any protection in the world that you can turn to, less doubtful than mine, I suppose I ought to say no more, and leave the house. But if there should be none, surely I am not so very selfish in asking you to take your chance with me? I honestly believe that I shall have little difficulty, with ordinary caution, in escaping from pursuit, and finding a safe home somewhere to begin life in again with new interests. Will you share it with me, Laura? I can try no fresh persuasion —I have no right, perhaps, in my present situation, to have addressed so many to you already."

Her other arm stole round my neck; she laid her warm cheek against mine, and whispered:

"Be kind to me, Frank—I have nobody in this wide, wide world, who loves me but you."

I felt her tears on my face; my own eyes moistened as I tried to answer her. We sat for some time in perfect silence—without moving, without a thought beyond the moment. The rising of the wind, and the splashing of the rain outside, were the first sounds that stirred me into action again.

There were considerable sales of known brands of country Lard to-day at 10¾c, deliverable here and at interior points. Other sales were made at 10c. Rumors were afloat that 10¾@10¾c had been paid for city rendered but we have no confirmation of them. The general report is that city is not to be had at less than 10¾c, and but very little at that, though, among those disposed to sell, the feeling is easier than in the morning. The demand for it at 10¾c is strong, but holders generally are much better satisfied to reserve it on its merits, aside from any speculative excitement that may exist in regard to it, than any other article.

Some sales of Mess Pork were made at $11. for country, and $11 10 for city, and of new country at $13 50. It is, however, only to moderate demand.

Chicago.

Live hogs were firm and active at the previous range of prices. Dressed Hogs were in good demand and 5@10c higher, with sales at $4 25@5 to $4 30@5 25 for lots dividing on 200 lbs. Mess Pork is dull and nominal at $13 75@14; for city-packed, and $13 25@13 50 for country. Lard steady and firm at 9¾@10c. Other descriptions of Hog product are without material change.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

The sales of Cotton during the week are 25,500 bales, including 5,000 bales to speculators and 9,000 to exporters. The market opened very dull with considerable decline, but the news received from America and India caused some reaction, though notsufficient to recover the full decline, the market closing dull at a decline on the week of ¼d on American, but no material alteration in Surats.—The sales to-day, Friday, are 5,000 bales, including 2,500 to speculators and exporters, the market closing firm at the following quotations:
