The price of carpeting has doubled the past year, and is still increasing. This commodity would seem to be independent of the war, at least so far as any class of merchandise which is not used for the army could be, bit it is not so. The rise in carpeting is one of the direct results of the war, and its present value will not be likely to diminish until the war shall be be ended. A large proportion of our carpeting is manufactured abroad. The prices in England are higher than usual, and the increased rate of foreign exchange and the high tariff continue to appreciate prices here. Domestic carpets are also higher, in consequence of the scarcity of the materials used in their manufacture—wool, flax or hemp and cotton.
