THERE IS SOME ONE DEAD IN Voted against the Union THE HOUSE There is some one dead in the house, And the clock in the hall is still, And the maid walks as soft as the mouse That walks in the flour at the mill.

The sun-light creeps in at the door, The dog lies asleep in the shade : The cat is curled up on the floor, Where the light in dashes is laid.

The white sand on the floor is damp, And the table of pine is clear: The taper is trimmed in the lamp, Standing straight are the chairs with fear.

The curtains fall softly and white, The ivy leaves eling to the wall: With a quiver of changeful light They carpet the floor of the hall,

Yes, some one in the house is dead, That the long summer day knows; That the poppies and flowers have read In the low South-wind that blows.

The carpet of grass in the yard Is fleked with the clover-blooms whit And its green is all over starr'd With butter-cups, yellow and bright. oms white

The spring-house, far down in the shade, The leafy beach-tree spreads around; Has aspring, that runs to the glade With a lonely, scrowful sound.

The bright crimson roses are dead. No water nor care have they had: The birds in the tree over head Sit sorrowful, silent and sad.

The cherry-tree blossoms so white, Drift in billows the paths among: And even the flies, in the light Are wearily floating along.

All the doves to the mill have gone. All empty, and lone is the cote; The mill-wheels hum all the day long. And the ducks in the mill-race floats.

Yes, there is some one dead, I know By the silence around the house; The curtains are hanging so low, And the maid is as still as a mouse.

A heart fall of hopes and of love, Is laid in the grave away: And more slowly the pulses move Of the hour's of the weary day.

For a presence both pale and cold Pass if in thro' the open hall door. And one in purple and gold Wet out-to return nevermore.
