Admit this to be true, and does it afford any argument for passing another such law? Directly the contrary. It shows that the law authorizing the President to suspend the habeas corpus act was wantonly unnecessary, and therefore that it ought not to be renewed. The President imprisoned nobody; therefore there was nobody properly amenable to imprison nobody properly amerable to imprisonment. This is the rightful conclusion, if the President did his duty. It the traitors and wretches exist, to seize whom and cast into dungeons the law passed, then the President did not do his duty in not seizing them and casting them into dun geons. One of two things is clear, either the law was unnecessary or the President was faithless to his duty. In either event why should the law be passed again?
