More Female Spies.

We yesterday visited two temale spies, confined in the watch house in this city, and had some conversation with them, which if not exactly interesting, was satisfactory, so far as regards satisfying our curiosity as to what kind of women were engaged in that line of business. In the cell, stretched upon a bed lay a woman, we should judge about forty-five years of age, not at all good looking or in any way prepossessing, and unmistakeably an ignorant deluded creature. If the eye could comprehend at a single glance all the horrors, the suffering and misery brought about by this war, what an awful picture would it be to contemplate. What painter could depict it, what poet describe it? In our ears would have to ring the yells and curses of the combatants, the shrieks and moans of the wounded and dying; the lamentations of those who have lost father, husband, son, brother, lover, friend, or relative, cries for bread from famishing women and children, anxious hearts awaiting in dread expectancy the result of some mortal strife: all, swerything would have to be blended to give even a semblance to the scene and lecture.
