The State has proin some principle, either of equity, as applied to natural justice, or of poverty, as derived from a conceded inability, on the part of the debtor, to pay the debt he had legally contracted. In my judgment no such principle can fairly be applied to the conditions of the proposed compromise. Compromises between debtor and creditor are not unusual. They have their origin are not unusual. of relative or comparative poverty.

I have already shown that according t the United States census the basis of true value in your State is as one individual to three nundred and eighty-five dollars or property; and it is fair to presume that Allegheny county is not below this standard. The State of Maryland with a population of 687,409, including 171,131 slaves the bonds of Allegheny co., the terms of a compromise. The proposition was substantially to substitute for existing bonds, bearing six per cent. interest and running to maturity in about 24 years, a new set to maturity in about 24 years, a new set of bonds to bear 4 per cent. interest and not maturing before 50 years. To my way of thinking a claim for so extraordinary a concession, must have a foundation in some principle, either of equity, as applied to natural justice, or of powerly as 1862 for State and city purposes was $1.17 that Allegheny county has a basis of value for taxation less than Maryland by $277 per capita; while the city of Pittsburgh is $433 per capita behind the taxable basis of Baltimore. It may be objected to this course reasoning, that when a specific amount of taxes is to be raised, it will make but little difference whether the basis of values be enlarged or contracted, inasmuch as the definite proportions assessed to each property holder will remain substantially the same. This is strictly true, if the measurement of value is regular and appli ed fairly to each individual case. But the difference in principle becomes obvious, when the debtor presents to his creditors a statement of his assests fifty per cent. below their absolute value, and reasons from this fact to a present of the from this fact to an assumed inability to pay his proper proportion or total amount of his indebtedness. Under such circumstances the debtor would be fairly suspect ed of improper motives, if not of fraudu something more than the one-fourth of the property of Allegheny county belongs to its creditors; and then remarks that better for us had they it all allotted to them in actual partition, as it would save us the time and trouble of managing it for their use."
