This party has since so fallen ou in numbers that if an election were held to day they would cast less than one-third of the popular vote of the country. And of the popular vote of the country. And even this minority is divided in opinion as to the basis on which the Union should be restored. The idea that such a minor ity can cause its will to prevail in the permanent settlement of questions involving the very existence of the government is preposterous. An argument founded on this assumption would take for granted the total and permanent eclipse of the principle that the sovereignty resides in the collective body of the whole people. The only organ through which the whole body of the people can give effect to their views in a commenture of the first magniviews in a conjuncture of the first magnitude is a convention of all the States,— Such a body would be untrammeled by precedents, and unembarrassed by specu-lative legal refinements. It would be at ilberty to deal with great questions purely on their merits, and could exercise that large and statesmanlike discretion which night be requisite for harmonizing conflicting interests, and settling this calamit ticting unterests, and settling this calamit ous controverey on a basis which would command the approval and suffrages of a majority of the whole people. There need be no fear that the wide latitude of discretion possessed by such a body would throw our axisting institutions into general guarantee against that in the fact that the great and essential feature of our existing Constitution are equally satisfactory to the eople of all sections. The confederate constitution is mainly a word for word transcript of the Constitution of the United States. The chief divergency is in the provisions relating to slavery. There is no danger, therefore, that a convention of all the States would disturb and unsettle ose parts of the Constitution which have been mainly instrumental in giving to our country the unparalleled career of pros-of the capacity of man for self govern-ment. It is only the questions which accasioned the war, and which have arisen accasioned the war, and which have arisent in its progress, that require adjustment and no adjustment has any chance of stability which rests on any narrower basis than the approval of a majority of the whole people.

Indications are daily transpiring that the administration do not mean to receive back the revolted States, except on condi-
