It can, in fact, without stretching, cover and shield the grossest outrage upon statute law, unon the Constitution, upon civil rights and personal liberties older than the Constitution, guaranteed by it, but derived from sources higher than any government or any law. And this is not the language of denunciation, it is the simplest phrase of

We say nothing now of the fact that ev-ery judicial decision ever made in our su-preme tribunal holds that the suspension of the writ is a legislative function, not to be delevated and except by a Bernbling be delegated, and, except by a Republican Congress, hitherto undelegated; that it cannot be delegated to the executive, nor become in any manner a lawful executive act. Congress has assumed the power of delegation, and Mr. Lincoln has already exercised it. That usurpation is not exclusively his own, and is not new.

There is a law of Congress under which President Lincoln assumes to act. He quotes it, and professes to derive his au-thority and justification from it. Batthat act. itself a stretch of outbority. thority and justification from it. Dat that, act, itself a stretch of authority, has, af-ter all, its own restrictions. It does not confer unlimited power, Mr. Lincoln would make it appear that his conception confer unlimited power, Mr. Lincoln would make it appear that his conception of "public safety" is the only limit and term which it prescribes to him. Though the first draft is over, its difficulties sur-mounted, and no new draft annoanced. Mr. Lincoln alleges the requirement of "public safety" and anounces the uni-versal suspension of the writ. THE LA'LEST USURPATION. The President's Proclamation. From the World. The startling Proclamation of Mr. Lin-coln, suspending the privilege of the writion of the President of the United States, any military, naval, or civil officers hold per-monon under their command and in their custody, is the most monstrong stretch of illegal and ungranted power which the custody, is the most monstrous stretch of illegal and ungranted power which the swelling andacity of the Chief Magistrate has yet permitted to himself. Its anthor-ity is professed to be derived from an act of Congress, its scope is pretended to be confined to certain specified classes of of fenses and persons. It is, in fact, an
