There died recently in Havana, a millionaire named Den Joachim Gomez, whose property at his death amounted to nearly five million of dollars, and the circumstances attending whose death would form the basis for a romance of the most theiling sensational description. In listence, This story is no fable, but a thrilling sensational description. In former years, before the slave trade was so much kept in check as it has been within a few years past, the island of Cuba was the great transstlantic depot, in which the cargoes of slaves from the African coast were landed and disposed of either to planters in Cuba or purchasers from to planters in Cuba or purchasers from the Southern States. In this business, as is well known, rapid fortunes were mid. the profits of a single successful voyage being sufficient for a brilliant fortune but, as a rule, the slave traders, like all other kinds of gambiers, verified the cld adage, "Soon earned, soon spent," and as a consequence Havana and the principal towns on the island, where these dealests resorted to get rid of the constant. ets resorted to get rid of their gold be-came the Meccas for the penniless pilgrims
