MONDAY MORNING, MAY 16, 1864. THE TWO ROUTES' TO RICHMOND. So bitterly hostile is the National Administration and its leaders to the persecuted and defamed Gen. MCCLELLAN, that the route he had selected for his approach to Richmond, has been studiously avoided by them, in making their campaign against the rebel capital. The reason of this is, that the Administration would rather reach Richmond overland, with a loss of a hundred thousend plan without firing a gun. The official reports of McCLELLAN's seven day's fights on the Peninsula, ending with his victory at Malvern Hill, show that he lost in all that time 1,589 killed; 7,709 wounded; and missing 5,958 making a total of 15,-249. Now mark what follows. By the most reliable accounts we have of the first six days, 40,000 men. This is the New York Tribune's estimate, and it is corroborated by other statements. Of this immense number but few comparatively were taken prisoners. MCCLELLAN with his small losses was half way to Richmond, as compared with Gen. GRANT upon the close of the latter's sixth day's fighting. If this proves anything it demonstrates that the Peninsula route to Richmond is the safer one after all: but the Administration will not select it. To do so would be a compliment to Mc CLELLAN's sagacity, and the powers at Washington cannot afford it.

There are some other points in the two campaigns which are suggestive. The reader will remember that when MCCLELLAN was about to start upon his Peninsula campaign, the President withdrew from him McDowel's forces, forty thousand strong, which disarranged his whole plan of operations. Supposing when LEE made his furious charges upon MEADE. the first day of the present series of battles, Gen. His idea is to win, at all hazards, regardless of life, If he succeeds in reaching Are wives, patriotic and confiding-Richmond and in destroying the rebe army, it will, amply repay the country for all our sacrifices. MILITARY REPUTATION. Some of the newspapers, we perceive are engaged in the consideration of the mutability of military reputation. The experience of the past three years goe to demonstrate that the great poet was right when he said that, "reputation is an idle and a most false imposition; often got without merit and lost without deserving." Sometimes we see genuine merit and the most unmistakable gallantry overslaughed, and more spinsters in the art of war elevated to important positions in the service. The credit of great achievements are often appropriated, by tricksters, while the deserving are left totally unnoticed. Looking back to the commencement of hostilities and seeing the mutability of military reputation one is induced to inquire, what does it all amount to? they will. The Boston Daily Advertiser alluding to this subject, soliliquises in this way: | To the Editor of the Post. There are, for instance, not many people toton who care to recollect the par they bore in the spontaneous triumph which giving "early and always reliable in overwhelmed Gen. BANKS on his last visit here. On that very day that very favorite of the peo ple was congratulated by a friend on the hold he had upon the public favor. 'Yes, madam.' The Administration is the great nower which makes and unmakes military reputation. It has control of every avenue of news, It has control of every avenue of news, and when disaster occurs it can blame it where it pleases, and its victim suffers accordingly. accordingly. Sir JOHN FALSTAFF seems to have had a practical idea regarding this ques-tion of military reputation. After a careful consideration of the military sit. nation at the battle of Shrewsbury, he said of Honor prices me on, but how if honor military me on take away can honor the military are on take away honor military me on take away honor Can honor set a leg? no; or take sway nize them.
