DEFECTORS—K. Millet, Jr. James M. Auley Date of the South Anna one provided in the very five thousand troops, and, that in the character which they have assumed as oftening the best protection to those who desire to be insured.

DEFECTORS—K. Millet, Jr. James M. Auley Date of the congression of the success of the southern arms, the febels would not have two things General Grant must do. The position at present occupied by General and proposition at present occupied by General conditions.

The real use, however, of the slave population residing in the South has been in the agricultural and industrial labor they have performed, and in filling up the granaries and workshops of the rebellion. If the blacks should, in the course of time, held as they are in a state of servitude, prove to be a cause of weakness to the South, it will be only because they discover the position they occupy in that community. But at present, as they have not yet been called by education and circumstances to think for themselves, or to discriminate between southern slavery and northern freedom, they adhere, through the influence o habits, and an effeminacy natural to the habits, and an effeminacy natural to the black race, to their present social status. The Military Operations of the Rebels. In Richmond people appear to have the utmost confidence in the ultimate success of General Lee and of General Johnson. They look upon the battles they have fought as sabstantial successes. if not glorious victories, and upon their retreat in the interior of Virginia and Georgia as a step calculated to complete our defeat. In a word, they say that an advance in these two states, far from our bases of operations, in the midst of an unknown country, at the close of a series of conflicts which must necessarily have lessened the efficiency and the morale of our soldiers, is a piece of madness which will bring about the destruction Perhaps this language is but a way of disguising their own fears; per-haps, weakened by the desperate resist. ance they have made, the falling back of Lee and Johnson was a piece of comput. sory strategy, which does in no way involve the deep designs which public opinion lends to the two officers. However and whatever may be the view aken of their movement, the contraction of the rebel lines and the distances we are compelled to put between our basis of supply and our advancing columns. are of real advantage to the two generals
