The reasons why Mr. Lincoln will be renominated are twofold. In the first place, he is popular with the "plain people," who believe him honest, with the rich people, who believe him safe, with the soldiers, who believe him safe, with the soldiers, who believe him teligions, and with the soldiers, who believe him to have been specially raised up for this crisis; and, in the second place, because many of the thieving and corrupt scoundrate of the political mews, who know the fact of his popularity, have eagerly attached themselves to the car of his success.

Now that Mr. Lincoln has received his expected re nomination, I resume the review of the Administration. The President being now an object of considerable comment, possibly a few short stories about him and his plans and pe-culiarities may not prove uninteresting. Mr. Lincoln as an Antiquarian—He Establishes Orders of Nobility. Mr. Lincoln is a patriot, and although

s patriotism is not of the elevated order which graced a Chatham, a Pitt, or a Wellington, still it is original and sa-lient enough to strike public attention, and to be for the instruction and profit of future generations. Unable as he is express it on the battle-field as a soldier, in the cabinet as a statesman, in public assemblies as an orator, in the closet as a writer, he expresses it in his humble way, modestly, silently, methodically, like an antiquarian or a colthodically. like an antiquarian or a col-lector. His patriotism is what I would call a symbolic patriotism. It consists in gathering mementoes of our war, and lubeling them with a joke of his own. He has set up in a carved gilt frame a piece of Opdyke shoddy cloth, a fragment of General Pope's headquarters, Meade at the battle of Gettysburg, and the tin pan in which General Grant washed his face before the taking of Vicksburg. Since the battles of the Wilderness he has added to his collection an invaluable object. He has, I am on those occasions, and is, I understand, on the eve of decorating the White newly born aristocracy which now fat-tens on the sweat and blood of the peo-A Serious Conclusion. Many people no doubt, will, in reading this, think that the writer draws upon his imagination for his statements, and that nothing is more unlikely than the history he relates. To this I will answer that fiction is sometimes more real than facts, that the theory announced by Gallieo that the court wine ground the sun ileo that the earth runs around the sun ileo that the earth runs around the sun and upon its own axis, is, as far as our senses are concerned, a fiction; the sun is in reality the only one which seems to move, that when the great French minister and historian, M. Thiers, announced a year before the coup d'etat to the French houses that the empire was made the fiction which he used on that made, the fiction which he used on that occasion was as real as reality itself, and as correct as a geometrical proposition.

The letters of nobility to which I have just alluded are of the same character. They may perhaps exist nowhere else at present than in the imagination of the shoddy and military aristocracy which Briarwood Pipe, the Marchioness of Pope's Headonartors war here not Pope's Headquarters, may have not yet received the sitles for which they so ardently aspire, nay, have not yet seen the stool on which they will be allowed to sit. But this does not prevent the uses and customs inherent to European monarchy to be sooner or later introduced among us. The opportunity is the only thing which is now waited for by the minions of power. Let that opportunity comes and we will have the portunity come, and we will have the rank, the title, the social distinction, the court levies, the military display, the salute, and all the ceremonial which exists in countries governed by monarchs and dictators. Indeed, have we not already among us all the elements of the most unmitigated despotism—packed conventions, gagged bills, the arbitrary suppression of newspapers, the letters of cachet, etc. As to the principles on which monarchy and dictation rest, they are, as I have said already at work. popular liberties are at an end.
