Effects of Sanitary Fairs.

The Sanitary Commission Journal, alluding to the great fairs being held in behalf of the Commission, complains that, however creditable these fairs are to the charity and patriotism of the people, they have thus far resulted in loss rather than in gain to the Sanitary Commission. Instead of filling the treasury to overflowing, as many people imagine, they bid fair at this moment to be instrumental in bringing its funds down, during the coming summer, to a lower point than they have ever reached before. It says the Commission has received from all of them, so far, $426,000, and expect to receive $1,000,000, but they must refer to some time antecedent to the most successful of the fairs, for several of them have realized each as much as the first named sum. She Journal adds the following:

Our receipts in supplies last year amounted to $2,000,000; at the rate at which they have been coming in during the last four months, they will not this year amount to more than $1,000,000; in other words, they have fallen off exactly one half. This leaves the value of our receipts, including those derived from the Fairs, not what it was in 1863, but in reality much lower. The million dollars worth of supplies which we received last year, we have this year to purchase ourselves, at prices which are certainly twenty-five per cent. higher than they were twelve months ago, so that instead of being so rich that we do not know what to do with our money, we are suffering from the Fairs a deduction from our previous income of at least $200,000.

This is a result we need hardly say which was not foreseen when the Fairs were started. If the public now cease to support us as before it would have been vastly better for the soldier that not one of them had ever been held. And unless the people resume their contributions of supplies, and leave us the proceeds of the Fairs as a clear addition to our income, we shall have to curtail our operations instead of extending them.

We do not doubt that much of the falling off in the contribution of goods is due to the exhaustion of household stores and the enormous rise in the price of nearly every article of general consumption. To the mass of people throughout the country it is undoubtedly harder to give now than it was two years ago. All we can say on this point is, that an increase of sacrifice and privation is the inevitable consequence of the prolongation of the war. The longer it lasts, the more we must all suffer, the citizens at home as well as the soldier in the field. We shall have every week a greater number of wounded and disabled men on our hands, whom it is our duty to take care of, and it is a duty which we cannot and ought not to shirk. It, no doubt, every day costs more to do it, but it is none the less sacred and imperative for all that. To this, people must make up their minds. We, as well as the army in the field, have enlisted for the war, be it long or short.

A Touching Scene.—We are often, while in the performance of duty brought to a knowledge of the good as well as evil that lies deep down in the human heart, only on special occasions to be called forth, as often surprising the possessor as those who, knowing him from childhood, all life-long looked upon him as a negative being. Yesterday, as we were making our way through a street that shall be nameless in this paragraph, inhabited only by the poor—the very, almost abjectly poor—our attention was drawn to a little girl, of good face, sitting on the last step of three leading to the hall-way of one of the tumble-down concerns of which the street is comprised, the upper one being occupied by a poorly-clad woman, whose face, though she slept, gave earnest through the hard lines of care abundant, that her early life had been better spent. The place and the hour led us to the belief that the woman was drunk, and that the child was watching for her recovery from the stupor of the liquor she had been drinking all day. Nearer approach to the group made our surmises almost a certainty, and we accosted the child, asking her if the sleeping woman was her mother and a drunkard. Notwithstanding the dirt that covered her pretty face, the blush that mantled it was plainly visible, and in a moment we regretted having spoken. "Mother is now poor and has to work hard to support us," and she burst into tears as she concluded: "but she is good to us. She is tired, sir, and is only resting herself, and I am watching for her, as she once watched for me. She is good, very good." The poor woman giving signs of awakening, we left, touched by the exhibition of fidelity and love as well as sensibility, in one so young. "I watch for mother, as she once watched for me."—Memphis Argus.

High Prices.—The wisdom of the counsel which tells people to punish "extortionists" by not using an article when it has advanced in price, may be pretty well illustrated in the recent rise of several articles of prime necessity. The butchers advanced the price of meat; people must not use meat. The bakers of Boston have advanced the price of the ten cent loaf to twenty cents; people must not eat bread. The shoemakers have again raised the price of shoes, and the advance is a considerable one; people must not wear shoes. If the advice is taken in all these instances, the people will soon leave themselves naked and starving. The rise of prices in all things is a fact beyond any one's control, and arises not from combinations and extortion, but from the necessities of the war and the means taken to carry it on. It is idle to talk of "extortion" when every thing that is consumed, all the materials of labor and the wages of workmen have alike advanced. With a million of men drawn from labor to fight battles, the production of the country must necessarily be less. Another million engaged in manufacturing materials of war in the workshops and shipyards, must draw that much labor from the production of food, and by making it scarcer, make it dearer. This, added to currency depreciation, raises prices all over the land, and sufficiently explains its necessity without resorting to "extortion" as a reason.
