These two cases of usurpation we have alluded to, because they are of recent origin, and when the American people imagined that the example of their Democratic institutions was causing rapid changes throughout the world But just now, instead of our endeavoring o extend Republicans principle into other countries, our business is to watch and save our own country from the fate of France and Mexico, "It is the bright day that brings forth the adder," and no man intoxicated and made dizzy with sudden greatness, is ever disposed ment it. Look at President Lincoln for example. When Mr. Lincoln was elected President of the United States, he entertained the conviction that even a minority of the people of any country or section, had a right to revolutionize their Government, it they desired it. When he became President he declared that he would not "aggravate existing evils" by attempts to coerce the seceded States; and when he called for seventy-five thousand volunteers, they were, he proclaimed, for the defense of the capital. The next step he took was to raise "an army of liberators;" the Southern people were oppressed, he said, by the repellious leaders, and he desired an army to relieve them from their appresiors. As soon as he succeeded in raising his army, and finding his party so far gone in fanaticism as to sustain him, he began to hint at emancipation and subjugation, until now he declares himself determined to wage interminable until he compels them to ahandon slavery.
