doubt whether it be the true and only cause Hucksters make large profits on the community and consequently it would be extremely desirable that their numbers be reduced; but ever PLAIN AND FANCY when huckstering was not practiced as extensively as they say it is at present the prices were nearly the same. The rise in gold might also account for it in part, but the rates demand ed to-day for all commodifies in the market do not differ very materially from those which the public were formerly forced to pay for the same things. The farmers themselves must reap large

Prices .- The prices of all the necessaries of life still continue very high, and it is astonishing to some how people are willing to pay such enormous prices while the supply in the market is so large. The supply of vegetables in the mar ket this year is, to say the least, not below the average of any of the past years; yet, except in a few instances, the prices paid for them are utterly unreasonable and out of all proportion.

Butter cannot be had at less than fifty cents per pound, and this price has been demanded so long for this article that the community have now become accustomed to it and think no more about it. But certainly this price is exorbitant, and those who are able to sell at such rates as these must reap enormous profits. But who is responsible far all this ? It would be rather difficult to determine through whose fault it is that the people are thus cheated out of their money,' for we can find no other term strong enough for these transactions. Some have been induced to attribute it to the illegal huckstering which they say is very prevalent in the market, and which they say excludes the people from all chance of dealing immediately with the producers. But although this fact might in a great
