"Eldridge Gerry, one of the Signers of the Decaration of Independence from Massachusetts, was chosen the first Democratic Governor of that State, and during his administration the party supporting him had the districting of it to suit their own liking. They were very indiscreet in the exercise of this power, and their political opponents showed them up to the people in the follow ing ludierous way: Maps of the State divided into counties, and these made into districts on the Gerry principle, were struck off and painled so as to rep resent animals called "Garrymanders." "A President without a party," could expect no sider it first rate: less; and such must be the condition of every man who comes into this office upon the happening of any one of the contingencies provided for by the constitution, if he shall exercise an independent judgment. The alarming pretension, by fair inference, to now set up, and that too in the highest quarter, that all Executive power is in abeyance, and its exercise a usurpation, in the contingency of the death of a person elected to the Presidency, and the succession of a Vice President, according to the positive requirement of the Constitution, to that station. The establishment of such a principle, as well founded in reason, and consonant to the fundamental law, would amount to an abrogation of the principle which has been regarded as lying at the foundation of all well regulated Government—that the three great Departments should be kept separate and distinct For if the Vice President, who succeeds to the Presidency on the death of the President, is to be denounced as an neurper, if he dere place his opinion on any subject in opposition to that of Congress, what will be the fate of the President who, having not even a plurality of electrial votis may, negerilieness, he elected over another (hi competitor before the House of Kepresentatives having a larger v. te, (and that, as well may be, by the casting vote of a member from a single State), and whose aggregate vota as represented in the House of Representatives may be a decide
