BY AUGUSTUS SHOWERARS. I have somewhere seen it stated, though where I do not now recoilect, that such is the loss of the Swiss for their native country, that their Matical Airs, when sung to Swiss Soldiers in foreign was vice, has often filled them with a melancholy water

Sing me the Song I loved to hear: Then in my native bome, among The friends my anxious heart held deary The Song that we so oft have song, It southes my soul, and brings again Myflong-loved Mountains to mine eyes-I roam once more the rocky plain Beneath my own, my native skies.

Let me the Alps behold suce more. And o'er their lofty summits trand. And hear the Cataract's stunning roar, As wild it seeks its rocky bed. Lit me a hunter once again The swift Chamois, like light, parage.

He flies-be flies! but all in valor My aim is now, as ever, true. Let me but stind where Urlach stand.

And see the Austrian tyrants by: They came to gather spoil and blood; And there their white bears would ring lie!

Ah, let me shout where fought my sires
The craves serie of Barguing;

Where fed with the control of the craves are for t Where, fed with blond, our battles' fires Illumined the path of victory.

Yea, let me weep o'er honor'd det --Honor'd by Tears and Songs along-It needs no monumental bust, To make, my sires, your virtues known-Yes, let me weep where Tell lies low, And see his spotless shade arise! Again he bends the erriese bow! Uncering, see, the arrow flies!

Sing me my own, my native Song! The song my free torn lathers sange. When, like a host, in Freedom strong. Upon the flying foe they spruug. Sing me the song I loved to bear When free in heart and young in soul, * ... I sought the rock and welcomed near The lightning's flash and thunder's rolls

Sing once that strain, that ere I die My soul may wander back again Where all my hopes and treasures lies Nor let me ask that song in vain. Feebly my heart clings yet to Time, My soul half-spreads its airy wing; My native hills, my native clime-

So said the Warrior, and his eyes He turn'd unto his much loved home. And reem'd to view his native skies-His parting lim south so oft had sung!

Ills soul shfolds its airy wing.
An I fades thise well-loved notes among. Norwich, N. Y. The following capital joke, occutting due a ring the visit of Victoria to Scotland, is vouched for by the Liverpool correspondent of the Union: A lavorite amusement of her Maie her royal spouse, was to take a walk before breakfast, by themselves, and explore the scenery about the place they were staying at. Many amusing incidents arose out of this, for they were accosted by people ansions for a glance at Royalty, who, michting them for private visitors, would inquisitively ask, When the bonny Queen would be seen? or 'What like mon was the last Albert, her joe! or 'How they would ken the Queen among sae many folks as would be wi' her.' The Royal couple used to encourage their queries, and rather mystify many who put them. One instance I particularly know to be true. A canny Scot whom they met, took them for a couple who had came, like himself, to see the great folia, and when they asked him the way to the Glen of Aberfeldy. stil crowned with the birks (birch trees) which Burns had immoralized in song, he said, 'Ye see, I'm just going that way my sel's for I hae a notion that the Queen and he Prince will be going to see Aberfeldy. and I shall like to be there and see them. He accompanyed them on, and the Prince asked how he would know the Queen?'-·Weel, said Sandy, 'I doubt not she'll west the crown of gold on her head. He was answered she would not 'Weel,' may be not, for it must be unco' heavy for her, puir thing; but I'll ken her by her stature, as she stands taller than all the rest of them."

Queen was not so tall as any of the ladies who would be with her. 'Eh, man,' seid the Scot, T'll ken her by her ce (eye) for 'twill shine like a star upon the dark blue sky at night. The Queen smiled, and the Prince said that they must now return, as they had seen the glen. A few hours after they drove to the glen and critical and delicate circumstances. They do not disturb there, sure enough, found Sandy before them. The Queen and the Prince smiled reck

While all were laughing at the joke, Sandy had atdled up the side of the Queen's carr and, just as the tale was ended, he handed his smuff box to Prince Albert, saying 'Year better hae a pinch o' the south that was a pratty trick ye tried on me this twish the urine.) is every where commanding the deep st laterest.
