Henry Clay and Abolition.

A recent occurrence in Indiana, taken in connexion with former events, shows Henry Clay in the character of a dodging, changing politician, of the Polonius school, ready to pronounce a thing a canel, a wessel or sywhale, just as he thinks a majority of the people think, or a majority of votes can be obtained.

A few years since. Henry Clay in his speeches before the colonization society represented slavery as an evil to the master and 'a grievous wrong to the slave,' and professed to desire its extinction. In 1838 however, the current appeared to run so strongly against abolition, and he was so often charged with being friendly to it, that his friends got up a petition in the District of Columbia against emancipation, for him Phoenix Bank, Boston, have caused a great to present-so as to give him an opportunity to make a speech on the subject.

In that speech he went the whole figure against abolition, and said in express terms, "I am opposed to emancipation, gradual or immediate.

. The opposition which this speech produced in a portion of the whig ranks was supled to the nomination of Harrison instead emonies" of a trial. A few of the fair of Clay in 1840. tion was presented to him signed by several abolitionists, asking him to emancipate his slaves, 50 in number. The orator devoted nearly one half his speech to the subject, endeavoring to shape his course so as to conciliate the abolitionists without displeasing their opponents.

He said, acording to the New York Tribune, 'that he deplored the existence of slavery as a national evil; and would willingly unite in any practical measure for its eradication.' This does not agree very well with his speech of 1838, when he was opposed to emancipation, gradual or immediate.
