The Vision of Charles the Tweeting BT H. R. ADDBINON.

Of all the singular apparitions or visions that have ever been set down, the visiog of Charles XII. is perhaps one of the most ion and defence of the political princip'es that have here curious, and certainly the best authenticas ofore been maintained by the Editors, in their respective ted colation of the kind on record, pending not upon the testimony of an iny

The origassace from all parts of the country and to have prepa-red such accounts of the Markets the the State of Trade open to the inspection of every travelles who desires to see it. The whole inclears ly and concisely written, and signed by

> in his Majesty's own hand writing, stating his thorough conviction that so strange vision must have been voucheafed to him as a prophetic warning, and also his desire that the sound document should be preserved among the S ate archives, in order to see whether the prediction would ave er be accomplished, This note beats data, some time before Charles was killed-as well as I can recollect, about 1716. The complete fulfilment of the vision came to pass in 1792, about eighty-six years after Wickersham, corner of Wood street and Virgin its appearance. As I unfortunately did not take an exact copy of the M S. when on the spot, I can only relate it as Learly style of the parrative from the first to the hird person.

It was a dark gloomy night. The clock had struck ten. The ill-lighted room cast an additional gloom on the figure of Charles the Twelfih as he sat in front of a. huge fire in his favorite saloon in the palace of Stockholm, Immediately in front, f him, over the fire-place, was suspended the picture of his Queen, with whom, to tell the truth, he had just been disputiog. and now he sat in silent discontent, mentally comparing the charming form which hung before him with the now less beautiful figure of her Majesty, breaking his sullen silence occasionally by muttering some curse on her altered temper.
