Toward noon-day Frederic- arrived at the house of his father. He had not been expected; his appearance was accompanied with an explosion of joy and tender exclamation. His mother burst into tears, and his sisters hung upon his neck, and sovered him with kisses.

"Where is my father?' said he, at last, tearing himself from the arms of his youngest sister.

You know.' said his mother, 'that of late he is frequently absent from home; he left us three days ago for a little village on the Bordeaux road, but we expect him today.'

My poor father! is he always so dejectod so gloomy?'

Alas my son, yes; but thy arrival, I hope, will restore him to his usual galety." When Frederic was seated, he was overwhelmed with questions of every kind, so great was the curiosity of his family to know all the particulars of his life since he had quitted his paternal home. Has nothing happened to you in your travels?' asked his mother. Nothing very strange, nothing but trifing adventure last night.'

And he recounted to them his night of agitation and of blood. It was terrible, for he spoke in a tone which proved that all he was saying was true.

'I forgot,' said he, as he finished his story, to tell you that I have brought corroborative proofs of my victory,' and at the same time drew a handkerchief from his pocket, which seemed to have some- ceived corroboration from several other thing concealed in its folds.

At this instant the door opened, and a man appeared, a man with a countenance pale and suffering, his clothes torn and soiled, and so much exhausted, that his limbs could scarcely support his trame. It perversion of our article, we should not was the father of Frederic.

cundemned the accused.

After the attorney for the crown had finished, the counsel for the defendant arose. He endeavored to prove an alibi. He argued, that it was impossible to establish the fact that the accused had slept in the inn upon the night in question, since the person who could have seen him declared that she did not know him.

No, gentlemen,' said he, as he concluded his defence, the accused has been the victing; the dagger of the assassin wounded him, not the sabre of his son.' And, as a proof, cried a voice from out of the midst of the audience; here are the -relics that I have preserved!'

And at the same time two fingers rolled upon the desk of the judge.

These flagers were passed before the eyes of the jurors; all were convinced that they belonged to the left hand, while the acccused was wounded on the right. Three days, afterwards, Frederic was
