THE LITERARY POST.

There is much imaginative delicacy and genus ine feeling in the following lines by a fair con tributor to the Dublin University Magazine. THE EMBROIDRESS AT MIDNIGHT,

BY MRS. GRAV, LATE MISS M. A. BROWNE: She plies her needle till the lamp Is waxing pale and dim; Sae hears the watchman's heavy tramp; And she must watch like him: Her hands are dry, her forehead damp, Her dark eyes fondly swims

Look on her work! her blossom flowers, The lily and the rose, Bright as the gems of summer hours. But not to die like those; Here, fadeless as in Eden's bowers, Forever they repose.

Once, malden, thou wert fresh and fairs As those sweet flowers of thine; Now shut from sunny light and air, How cans't thou choose but pine! Neglected flows thy raven hair. Like the uncultured vine.

Look on her work!-but look the more On her unwearied heart, And put aside the chamber-door That doth the daughter part From that dear mother, who before Taught her this cunning art.

She sleeps-that mother sick and pale-She sleeps-and little deems That she, who doth her features veil Ail day, in flitting gleame Of anxious hope, this hour doth hail, But not for happy dreams.

God bless her in her lone employ, And full those earnest eyes With visions of the coming joy, Waiting her sacrifice, When they who gave her this employ; Pay her its stinted price!

Think how her trembling hand will clasp The treasure it will hold. With that which seems a greedy grasp-Yet not for love of gold; That look-that sigh's relieving gas, Its deeper springs unfold.

Think how her hasty feet will toom To purchase for her humble home The food and clothing meet, And with what gladness she will come Back to this poor retreat.

Thy graceful broidery bu Only one half thy struggles know, And filial picty, Methinks some drop of pity's dew Would gem the proudest eye.

Poor maiden! if the fair ones who

Thy gentle heart will prove, Here ev r must the lot be hard. But there is One above Who sees, and will not disregard, Thy consecrated love. THE HOSTESS' DAUGHTER.

FROM THE GERMAN OF UHLAND. Conrad-Udal-Leoline, Students three have crossed the Rhine.

Turning from the road aside, To the little inn they hied,

Hostess, bring us wine and beer-Send your little daughter here.

My beer and wine are fresh and cleat-

Where the black palt o'er her lay. And gazed upon the features pale.

Ah wert thou living still, sweet May How would I love thee from this day. Softly did the second spread

The veil and wept-and turned his head. 'There art thou upon thy bier, Whom I loved this many a year.

And the third the veil uprist, And the dead white lips he kist.

Love to thee long years I bore, Love thee now and ever more!
