The Irwin Dinner. hour fixed for serving up the entertainment before his departure for the court of Denmark. The thronged assemblage embraced people of all shades of political opinion-there were plenty of sterling old Democrats from town and country, the Antimasons were represented by a full compliment of "blue noses"-among whom we observed that consistent and firm, but somewhat implacable Antimason, Alfred Sutton; who, with Major Willock and John Patterson, might be said to head the Antimasonic delegation on the occasion. Of the Whigs, too, we noticed goodly number, and among them Mr. Commissioner Morrison, and James Robinson were conspicuous. From this it will be seen that all party prejudices and feelings were buried, and the guests came together solely to do hanor to a public officer who had served them efficiently and well. When dinner was announced, nearly 200 persons took their seats, and many, we are told, were unable to procure places, so much did the crowd exceed the anticiunnecessary to say that the entertainment was an excellent one-the name and fame will appear in the regular proceedings,) not even the books. presided, and Messrs. After the graver matters were disposed of, several persons were successively called upon by sentiments. Judge Wilkins who always excels on such occasions, was especially happy in his response to the toast which brought him out, He complimented Mr. Irwin in the warmest and kindest terms, and playfully alluded to the fact that although he had been Mr. I's competitor in 1840, he took great pleasure in the honors that gentleman had won at his expense. The company were favoured, too, with songs from Messrs. Flynn and Plumer.

The entertainment was excellent in every respect. It could not have been amended in any part. There was nothing left undone by the committee nor the hosts to make the party pleasant, and we never were at an affair of the kind, in which so much good humor, kind feeling, and pleasantness prevailed.

The entertainment must afford deep and lasting gratification to the gentleman in whose honor it was given.
