> Bonaparte's Goldsmith.—This personage, whose name was William Biennais, lately died at Paris, at an advanced age. — He went from the Provinces in his youth Paris, to seek his fortune, and employed imself as a jeweller. By an accidental ircumstance, he reached the head of his profession there. General Bonaparte, on his return home from Egypt, wished to furnish his house, but the merchants to whom he first applied, refused to sell to him on er dit. Biennais had more confidence in the star of the young General, and he made to his order some expensive articles of furniture, without troubling himself as to the when he should receive his pay, Napo leon was grateful for this mark of confidence, and when he became Emperor, he employed Biennais for his Goldsmith .-The latter applied to the m st celebrated skilful workmen. Percier and Fontain furnished him with designs for his best articles, and his productions, which were in fact chefs d' œuvre, were sought for from all the Courts of Europe. Bienais proved to be not only a skilful artist, but he carried on his commercial enterprises with superior intelligence and a probity which was proof against every thing. One day he was accused to the Emperor of not having given proper weight in an article of high value. Being informed of this calumny, he called for an immediate examination, and the weight was found to exceed that for which he had stipulated. From that period, the Emperor's confidence in him increased, he treated him with the greatest kindness, and employed Biennais to furnish him, not only with the ical exhibition during the reign of the Emsible carriers, and the facilities for giving satisfaction to peror, and received from them a gold customers in all respects are surpassed by no line on medal.
