strained nerves in that terrible gloom; and ason, the strained nerves in that terrible gloom, and wild roar of the hurricane was heard howling and wild roar of the hurricane was heard howling and sliricking along the sea, as it rushed over the flatten waters, and striking us well aft; bowed us a momen before it, and then sent us, bare as we were, swift as a: thunderbolt before the wind—while the thick spray-swept like and wind from the waves, row obvered us in its thick, dense mist, holding every thing from our sight, and now flew wildly past us, as if borne of the wings of the spirit of the atorm. We spoke not, we heard not, we scarcely saw, but each man grasp. ing a rope, waited breathlessly till the first phrenzy of the hurricane should be spent.

It was an awful moment! In vain we strained out eyes around to catch a sight of our late enemy.

Nothing met the eye but the gloomy heavens above, and the thick curtain of mist shrouding us in its folds.

dealy beheld a single tall spar of the corvette, sowers sided and we saw that we were driving upon her, powerless before the gale. We could do little, if anything with the helm. The corvette, moreover, was a wreck; stripped of everything, and broaching to, with the way scripped or everything, and broading to, with the waters rolling like a cataract over her side, and her hostors truck cose hanging is affright in the shrabds, or wherever they could clutch appear it was an instant of himselbless harror.

We came so near, bearing right down towards her quarter, that I could have jumped on board of her, and for one moment as we rushed upon her, I thought was over. Wild, affrighted faces were seen upon our decks, looking in the sickly light, like ghastly apectors from the tomb, but not a voice was heard, not a breath and a same the silence of the dead, we was the bearing of the dead. ant or drawn, as with the silence of the dead, we were which it pawith startling quickness, shouting.

despairing cries of her crew, borne after us on the wings of the wind. When the gale had past its first sity, and the mists that rose from the dense spray had partially subsided, we swept the horizon eagerly with our glasses, to see if we could behold any traces of our late antagouiste. It was almost dark, and our vision was then fore, limited, but though the frigate could be seen well nigh hull down upon the starboard quarter; no vessage of the ill-fated correcte was disernable even to the keenest Egirt. What her fare was God only knows!
