A TOUCHING STORY. (CONTINUED.) fore mentioned, the Indians were then no strangers to the soil. Often parties of from fifty to a hundred would encamp in the adjacent woods, and there tarry sometimes for months; their bashets, browns, moccesins, and other articles of truffic, finding a ready sale in the houses of the whites.

Unlike most children of the age, Guity fearlessly attached herself to these dwellers of the forest, who, in return, manifested by their unough automa of the is return, manifested, by their uncouth gestures of delight, and many little presents of ingenious fabric, their iy styled her, 'the little Sloe-blossom.' Springing like is styled her, 'the little stor-occasion.' Springing mae a fawn to the arms of the savage, Gaity would eling fondly to them; sometimes passing whole days emid their wigwams, in unrestrained freedom, playing with the little papoose, weaving rushes with her small taper fingers, or learning to adorn the smooth bark with the quilts of the porcupiue.

This wandering tribe was generally accompanied mote from theirs, and his time generally occupied in hunting the game, which, even at that early period was considered a rarity; or in a birch canoe, accompanied by his grandson, Onowahou, a lad of twelve, would softly glide where the umbrageous woods over-canopied the river, and there, with a composure which "old Izaak" might have envised, insuared the silvery troat which frequented its waters. The results of these la-bours or pleasures often found their way to the table of Mr. Trevor, being assally left after nightfull spon the doorstone, in the most quiet manner, by Monstali-qua himself, who took this method to manifest his graitude for various kindnesses received at the hands of

Mr. Trevor. Between Gaity and the young savage Onowahos there had always existed the warmest friendship. He Corner of Wood and Water sts,

GEORGE ROTHERY, Another moment, and she was safe in the arms of Mon-atuloque; the next. a shower of files fell around her from the hand of Onowahoo, who had again plunged in to divert the terror of the trembling child.

At another time, when Guity had been as usual rambling for hours in the forest, she became weary, and throwing herself under a tree, lay for some time racing pictures in the light fleecy clouds as they fracing pictures in the fight neery clouds as they floated above, and in trying to count the green leaves frolicking and dancing to the soft wind around her head. On a neighboring tree a golden ariole had perched himself, swinging, with the most enviable security, upon thevery extremity of a large bough, pourling forth his rich notes in one delicious gush of melody; these, too, did the little maiden try to imitate; but at length the clouds floated dreamily away, the leaves at length the clouds nonted dreamily away, the leaves moved to a more gentle measure, and the song of the ariole grew ever fainter and fainter. The child slept. It being near noon, Mr Trevor himself went in search of histrant child. He soun discovered her and advancing gently to awaken her; but, conceived housen, on statutes this measure to discovere a leave the search. hearor, on approaching nearer, to discover a large rat-tlesnake coiled within a few foet of the sleeping inno-cent! He dares not advance—he fearsto move, lest he may arouse the reptile—his very senses seem to be forsaking him, from terror at the danger his child; when, suddenly, he sees Onowahoo approach. The boy drops noiselessly amid the deep grass, and glides:
