Reaching the fower, the earl selected fifteen of the youngest and handsomest amongst the gypsy men, and these, with Sir John Fan, were placed beneath the and these, with Sir John Faz, were placed beneath the green plane tree in front of the bouse; the rest he dismissed with blows and stripes. They fied in terror, howling and lamenting; the laughing, merry maidens weeping; the old men, the women, the children, all alike feeling that some terrible consummation was about their friends, their lovers, their fathers, their companions, in common doors. But they did not dare to ask for mercy; they knew too well the stern earl's temper—all turned in sadness and despair away.

The eart hid that the fifteen should, one by one hung signs the plane tree, and that, last of all, Sir Jehn Rea chould suffer the same fate. Then, with strong arm, he led his lady into the castle, spite of her wild engreaties to be allowed to perish with her lover—spite of her lead shricking farewells!

Johnie Fan echood her farewells, but in firmer tones
middled with heart besten blessings and grayers for her happiness. He reiterated a thousand times his expressions of undying love and worship—his thanks for the return she had made him—his acknowledgement of her affection. These two lovers, thus on the strains of separation—of death—of distributed agony, thought only of each other and their love! To them the future seemed nothing, as the past must soon be; and all that was to come, and all their weight of guilt and all feer of punishment in this world, or in the next, were least in the absorbing sorrow of that parting.

The lady was dragged into the castle—the rope was around the neck of the first of the poor gypsies who was thus to die for the fault of others, when a voice at she window of the tower facing the plane tree, wa beard to exclaim: 'Yes, thou shalt see it all-see all the misery thy crime causes—suffer as these suffer; think of the condemnation thou hast given these, then live to remember!'
