Could I has seen yo comfortably settled, it's ome one to shield ye from the cauld world, I could ne died in peace. But it maun na be, it madn na be."
> Poor Jeanie had listened to her father's words with emotions we will not attempt to portray. Long after overy one che had given up her lover for lost—and besides a rumor now of two years' standing, that he had been drowned at sea, there was a fact of his not re-turning at the appointed time, to silence all skeptician -she had clung to the hope of his being alive, even when her reason forbude the expression of that hope. ly strengthened and purified by his loss. Try as she ould she could not tear his image from her heart.-Loving him thus, living or dead, how could she wed another!—how could she take on herself vows her heartrefused to fulfil? Day after day, week after week, month after month, had this struggle been going on in her bosom, betwirt duty to her iather and love for him to whom she had plighted her virgin vows. This vening her parent had spoken to her mildly, but seiously on the death of her lover, and deunie's heart was more than ever multed by the self devotedness with which her gray haired father had all aded to her want of protection in case of his death, not eventsaying a word of that want of common comforts of life, which his growing infirmities rendered the more necessary than ever, but of which her conduct—oh! bow selfield;

in that moment it seemed to her-deprived him. Is, was some moments before Jeanie could speak, during which time she lay weeping on her parent's bosom "Do wi' me as ye wish, father, I maun resist no longer, sin it were wicked. But oh! gie me a little while to prepare, for the heart is rebellious and hard to overcome. I know you do all for the best-but I mann thoughts which soon wi'be sinfu', from my heart"—and overcome by the intensity of her emotions she burst into a new flood of tears. Her father pressed her to her bosom, and murmured. "Oh! Jeanie, Jeanie, could ye know how this pains
