and were invariably seated in the old family pew before the church bell has finished ringing; but Mr Stan-Sey would have considered it wrong to go in the aftermoon as it was right to go in the morning. He held it that women, to whom every courtesy should be shown, even to standing up when a lady went in or out of room, were, for all that, not of sufficient importanc to make their going or not to afternoon prayers a mat ter of consequence; so he permitted his daughter to do no the plaused; and it was a treat to see her leav-ing the village plaused; to note the shrivelled hands lifted in bilent or half attered prayer for the blessing of their lives; to watch the children crowding round er path, to catch the smiles so willingly exchange for theirs; and to listen to the words of kindness, c colation, or advice, which fell from her lips, that were as eloquent as her father's were silent. In the stately reception that Mr. Stanley's desires. Tether than his words, had required that she should bear so distinguished a part, she managed to combin the nameless and numberless formalities of the old school with the ease of the new; it was not that she seemed to do or say a great deal, but, if absent from illness or any other cause, something, the most important of all things, was immediately discovered to be wanting, not by one person but by all.

"I have served many ludies in my sime-and seen 'many," continued the old housekeeper, one day, in a confidential tone, and yet one of aged excitation. "I was own maid to the first Mrs Stanley, a lovely creature she was and well the master loved her, until when they had been three years married, finding she bad no children, his love cooled, and she soon died.-He married at the end of a year and a day, just such iter and her own death was within one hour o was over." 'She is in heaven, sir,'I whispered;he drew back, covered his face with his hands one minute, and "then inquired, "And the child ?" "A sweet daughter sir," I said, "Lost her life for a daughter!" muttere ny master, stalking away like a shadow; and that was the sting, poor gentleman-a daughter ! Then there was another wife, self-willed, and a beauty; she left him two noble boys, and though when my master fol lowed the last of them to the grave, and he was only five and thirty, he said, "I am too old, I will murryn more: there is a curse over the inheritance." But of these three ladies, and of all that ever came to and from this house, there never was any like Miss Stan lev; there are none like her, and there never will be !'
