The Daily Morning Post. Correspondence of the N. Y. Com. Advertiser.

POORLAWS OF ENGLAND. LONDON, April, 1844. A provision for the destitute poor has been established in England, by law, for nearly two conjuries and a half; as the act 43d of Elizabeth (A. D. 1601) may be said to have introduced it. In the time of Henry VII. a vast amount of indigence was suddenly produced, by the breaking up of the feudal system; by the facilities which were afforded to the great landed proprieter for discourse for the system. proprietors for disposing of their estates; and by the introduction of more refined modes of indulgence and luxury, as a consequence of the profound internal peace which reigned, (after the union of the two great houses of York and Lancaster,) under Henry's able and vigorous administration of inable affairs. The and vigorous administration of public affairs. The numerous retainers which every great lord, or pro-prietor, before that, considered it necessary, either for his safety or his dignity, to have round his person, being no longer consistent with the changed habits of the times, were dispersed, and these bold and unruly men, not finding immediate employment, filled the land with robberies and petty tumults. This evil was stayed to a certain extent, by the aid which the religious houses offerded to the outcosts; but even their revenues were insufficient for the burden thus sudden thrown upon them; and when these religious establishments were themselves suppressed in the following reign, a still vaster inaudation of mendicancy overspread the country. Many statuary enactments were passed against "sturdy vagabonds and valient beggars," until, at last, came the celebrated act of Elizabeth, above mentioned, to which is owed the system, that has, until very recently, provided in England and Wales for the compulsory maintenance of the pooc.

The chief provisions of this act gave to the overseers of the poor power to levy upon the inhabitants of their respective perishes, "such sums as should be neessary to support the aged and infirm parishioners, and for setting to work all persons using no ordinary and duily trade of life to get their living by." From the passing of this statute, there had been no considerable increase of population to the middle of the last century. Since then, no doubt, the increase has been immense and rapid. So no have endeavoired to connect this fact with the existence of a system of poor laws. But not only is this disproved by the same result not having been before produced under a similar state of circumstances, but it may readily be accounted for apon other grounds,—particularly the great development of the material resources of England in aghe increase in numbers of the population of Scotland where there has been very little compulsory provision or the poor, has been equally rapid.

It may further be remarked, that from the year 1601 o the commencement of the last war there was little the public generally that all fature favors will be duly appreciated. Their articles have been fully tested, of which sufficient testimony will be given to any inquirer. The principles of their locks and safes are not surpassed in the Union.

The principles of considerably lessened, and will be found as low, if not below any other responsible house in the Union.

The country suffered none of those injurious results which subsequent mismanagement produced. Indeed, down to 1795, the complaint, however unfounded, was, that the pour-law had diminished the population and raised wages. This is susceptible of a very satisfactory solution; for it is no doubt perfectly true as is negled by this Africance for a very satisfactory solution; for it is no doubt perfectly true as is negled by this Africance of pauperism. During the whole of this time the old poor-law system was in full operation.

France too once boasted that she had no poor law; that she was free from "that English plague." Du-ring the heats of the revolution, and the national gloes and disasters of the Empire, the cries of the poor were unheard. But what a spectacle is presented by many parts of France at the present moment; particularly in the South and East. We see no wealthy form ers with the inclination and the power to take advantage of any agricultural improvement, no independent tage of any agricultural improvement, no independent landed gentry, spending their money among the tenantry, and improving them by example; but many of the latter, with means just sufficient to enable them to live in Paris a life of idleness, singleness, and of the utmost dissipation. While on the other hand we view a rapidly increasing agricultural body of small holders, little raised above the class of laborers, and who will be succeeded by others still more numerous and consequently worse off. What elements are here for turbule ice and warlike aggressions! Many attempts have been recently made to alleviate the extensive misery spread over the surface of France, but they misery spread over the surface of France, but they uve been partial and unattended with much success. laws in England, as administered before 1795; upon the whole very effectually attained the objects to be wished for.
