To write an anosymous letter is rather revoking; much may be said against it; it is one's dernier resort; still it has its advantages—and why make its Had Colonel Plinth not been what he was were he but a casual acquaintance or a more friend-

But he was my brother-in-law—my brother in arms in a word, Colonel I linth. Had he been a man who would listen to teason who was open to conviction—to whom one might venwho was open to conviction—to whom one migue venture to speak—why really—

But he was hot as curry;—yet not deficient in sense;

But dreadfully opinionated—techy—casily succeptible of feeling himself insulted—careful as to keeping nis pistol-case in such a state as to be ready at a moment's notice—a being, inflamed in body, soul, and complexion, by the spices and rum of the burning east.

To remonstrate with him would have been absurd;

Under such circumstances— conscious of his infatuition, I ceased to waver: the end sanctified the means: and I wrote him an anonymous letter.

She, of course, would make a point of having chil-Evadne had never been a mother; the Colonel was the only Plinth in the universe; and, posited as I was, Evadue being the link—I anturally had expectations.

To say nothing of being nine years my sonior, he was a wreck—a fiery wreck, full of combustibles, burning a wreck—a hery wreck, tull of compusities, purning gradually to the water's edge.

The sun of his happiness, would, as I felt, set forever, the moment he married such a creature as Moggs, innately vulgar—repulsive—double-chinned—tunid—protuberant. Social festivity was everything to Coleme Plinth; but who would dine with him, if his many than the coleme is the sun of the coleme in the coleme in the coleme is the coleme in the coleme

Therefore, under a sense of overwhelming duty to ol. Plinth, I wrote him an anonymous lette Every precaution was taken; the hand was disguised—the paper such as I had never used, and, to orows all, I dropped the important document in a distant and very out-of-the way post office.

Conscious of perfect security—animated by the cause I had espoused, I played away upon him, from my masked battery, with prodigious velocities. Reserve was out of the question; in an anonymous letter, the was out of the question, an all as its great advantage, writer of course, speaks out; this is its great advantage.

I sack a rapid review of his achievements—I recalled the accomplished Evadne to his mind's eye—I contrasted her with his present intended t—Larry the trusted her with his present intended t—Larry the trumpeter figured in, and the forcible expression as to Casar's wife was not forgotten. I rebuked—I argued —I ridiculed—I scorned:—I appealed to his pride—I mentioned his person. I bade him consult a cheval glass, and ask himself if the reflection wase that of a would-be bridegroom. I told him how old he was—what the Indian army would think—its short, the letter carried upon the face of it the perfect conviction of a thirty-two nounder. His salute was charmingly courteous; be begged leave to introduce a friend—Baron Cahoos, a noble Swede in the Prussian service. Never before had I beheld such a martinet—where could Plinth have
