The Death of a Miser .- In a letter from Munich, dated 24th March, we have, says a French paper, an account of the death of an old mendicant named Marguerite Kerlerinn, who during her last moments called her sister to the bedside, and requested as a last favor to have the can she then wore buried with her, stating it was a gift from one who had been a friend to her. -A few moments after she expired, the sister, wishing to retain the band of the cab, commenced separating it and in so doing discovered bills to the amount of one hundred and ten florins, a sum equal to two thou-

An old, care-worn, miserable and attenuated looking old man, who sits upon the steps of our public buildings and pitifully craves an alms from the charitable purse of every passer-by, is, we we are correctly informed, theowner of several houses in Oliver street, for which he collects considerable reuts. Another, who is crippled, but is in the possession of respectable competence, follows the same occupation.-There are dozens who thus extort money from the ge nerosity of hundreds who are poorer than themselves Ought we not to have a work house?—N.
