A PAINFUL PICTURE. Labor in English Factories.—During a recent debate in the British House of Commons on the Factory Bill, some interesting statements were made.
One of the members stated that females instead of remaining at home to attend to their children, were compelled to go in great numbers to the factories. In reply to this, another member said that male adults as at home to take care of the household affisics; while the women were away. Mr. Warburton said that it was between the year 1814 and the present time that the principal increase in the factory establishments of Great Britain had taken place. In 1814—he took a mean between two statements—60 000 000 like of a mean between two statements—60,000,000 lbs. of wool were manufactured in this country at present the amount was 500,000,000 lbs. A London paper remarks that shirt makers, hay makers, and even the young and delicate females that serve in the work-rooms of the most fashionable infl-

An official statement submitted to Parliment, confeins the following.—"Connected with the subject of over-working, I am desirous of again drawing your attention to the suggestion of some mill owners, stated in my last re-port, that no female of any age should be allowed to work more than 12 hours a day. I visited one night in November a mill in Manchester, where I suspect d the law to be violated. I saw some young persons, under 18 years of ago, under suspicious circus stances, but no more; in that mill, young women stances, but no more; in that mill, young women of 18, 19, and 29 years of age, work from six o'clock in the morning to hine at night, without ever leaving the mill, even for their meals, the engine going the mill, even for their meals, the engine going on all day without stopping. The frames are stopped, I was told, when they take food, but how long the not appear. Such a prohibition would, from all I have been able to learn, be approved of by a great majority of mill owners—by all, of course, who think 12 hours a day work enough for a strong man; and it would operate as a premium upon male labour—an effect
