A strong proof of the improved state of business at Fuirs generally, may be found in the absence of excite-ment upon political subjects. We are rapidly upproaching the general election for the chief magistrate near 19,000,000 of people, and the interest man fested is less than on ordinary occasions. Even the Tours question, with its momentous collateral issues, dras died away from the public mind. All this giv evidence that the attention of individuals is again enired to the approving state of their pecuniary affaire.
The probability is that the number of votes cast will be für less than in 1840, when it bore a larger proportion to the whole male white population than ever of
