The Effects of Nativeism on Mercantile Pros ng very perity.—An interesting fact has come to our knowl-which edge, which we think will impress our sober and mercantile community unfavorably as regards the effects of this principle, carried out into practice. New York went off and armed himself, and returned, when a and Philadelphia merchants are constantly in business quarrel ensued, during which White seized him by the throat, when Perkins drew a pistol and shot him by Philadelphia merchants of good stending, for goods bought in New York, were offered for negotiation at the New York banks. They were refused on the ground-"that however high those merchants might stand on that day, the next morning might witness the destruction of their houses and stores, and themselves reduced to beggary." The paper was sent back to Philadelphia to remain there on deposit.

Another fact is that a wealthy merchant who had been trading abroad came to Philadelphia, with $200,000 to spend the rest of his life there and to invest his property in real estate. He liked the air, and the people, till the riots came up, when, although he had commenced the erection of a house, he moved to New York and took up his final residence there.
