WOMAN'S LOVE. TI J. O. WHITTING Agnes bed loved -- undoabting by The bliss of her affection passed To its sole object rich and free As odors on the south wind cast-Hoard she the whisper of her fame, She loved it for sake of him Where highest tone of love became Like music of the cherubim.

Wreathed she with playful hand a flower Within her dark, voluptueus corl-It was her lover's wanted hour To kneel before his Minstrel Girl. Her very life seemed woven with The particle of her fervent love, So deoply that she might not breathe The promptings of a thought above!

Herlover died. Away from her, The ocean girls his require sang, And smoothed his dramless sepulchre Where the tall coral branches sprang? And it was told her how he strove With death-but not from selfish fear; It was the memory of her love Which made existing doubly dear.

They told her how his fevered sleep Revealed the phantom of his bruin-Her vigils at his couch of pain; And he would speak in his soft tone, And stretch his arms to clasp the air, And then awaken with a moan, the And weep that there was nothing there!

And when he bowed himself at last Beneath the spoiler's bold eclipse, Even as the weary spirit passed, Her name was on his marble lips; She heard the tale-she did not weep-It was too strongly sad for tears, And so she kept it for the deep mberings of after years.

She posted one low and platative wail For the loved dead-it washer last-Like harp tones dying on the gale Her minstrelsy of spirit passed; And she became an altered one, Forgetful of her olden shrine, As if her darkened soul had done With all beneath the fair sunshine.
