And as I am a story-telling, here is another anecdote connected with the Peninen lur war, which, in reference to this principle, I may also mention. When Marshall Soult quitted Coronna, the gallant Ney was left in command. He sent for mi rother, who was still a prisoner, and placed him in omfortable quarters. He also appointed on aid-decamp to attend upon him, a Frenchman, who spoke English well. In the meantime the news had got home that my brother was killed, and the family went into mourning. The Marshal paused a moment, and turning to him, said,—"Go, tell Major Napier has is free on one condition:—that if the Emperor refuses to role." To this, my brother gludly consented, and, on waiting on the Marshal, he was asked if there were any of his people whom he would wish to take with him. My brother said there were some forty or fifty women who had been left behind. These Ney ordered to be immediately released, and, turning to his aid-de-camp, added, "See that every soldier and every woman gets two Spanish dollars a-piece to take them home."— [Loud Cheers. ]

I was about to mention some particulars with regard to my brother as a historian. When I was in Paris, Marshal Soult gave me a dinner-not on my account, but as the brother of the historian—at which a umber of Spanish, Portuguese, and orther i of distinction were present. Marshal Soult then ad-dressed himself to me on the subject of the work, and ENGLAND, they shall at all times be prepared to said, that when my brother first wrote to him, requesting information from sources which he had at his command, he was by no means disposed to accede to the request, and wrote a cold letter in reply, stating that he had a journal of his own, but that he did not sep how the conduct of the French could be importially re-presented by a foreigner. "Your brother," said Soult, "wrote in answer, that his object in asking for the information, was for the purpose of writing an impartial history, and that, therefore, if there were any inaccuracies, I must not attribute them to him, but so the want of sufficient information. I took no further notice of the matter, but after a time, a letter came to me from your brother, stating, that in his researches, a-Jacob Boston, Proprietor, mong other documents, he had found a lot of letters belonging to Joseph, King of Spain, accusing me of wanting to throw off my allegiance to France.
