He makes but few gesticulations, but has a nervousness in his manner that gives great animation d spirit to the language he otters. Ho is, in fact, in one position scarcely long enough to say that he has accupied it; but with one hand under the tail of his frock coat, resting on the hip, he will with the other make a few upward and downward strokes, by way of applying more forcibly the emphasis he wishes to place on articular words, then step back a step, change his position, and put both bands on his hips, or his thumbs into the arm holes of his waistener. Remaining in this position perhaps thirty accords, an idea strikes him as peculiar applicable and important, when he steps forward to the table, which stands in front of his eat, rests his left elbow thereon, and with the fingers of s right hand clasps the palm of his left quickly, placing the strongest emphasis on the words and senti-ments he wishes to enforce, keeping his eyes the while on his opponent, and speaking rapidly and eloqueatly. He is graceful in his movements and postures, but he not such a variety of classical attitudes as Mr Chosto. of the United States Senate. His modulation is somewhat theatrical; but, above all, he is nearly free from he great imperfection of English speakers—at least judging from those I have heard in the House of Commons—numely, a kind of stammering or hesitation,
