Apart from the mere political results of the late elections, there is one aspect in which they can be con-templated, which is full of interest to all those who are devoted to free institutions. We have seen, after several months of deep and pervading excitement, the population of state after state, record their opinions on questions of great importance, in perfect order and peace. A stranger looking upon the agitated state of our societies just before the election, might naturally have supposed that it would be impossible to work off so much fermentation without violence. But in a single day, by the simple process of depositing a little piece of printed paper in boxes, the exacerbation has passed away, and the millions of human beings that the day before seemed ready to devour each other with rage and prejudice, quietly resume their wouted opcu-

There is in our view a moral grandour in this speatacle, which has not been equalled in the history of the human race.
