MR. JOHN ANDERSON. At 8 o'clock, on the morning of the 26th, the unortunate Dunn was brought into Court to receive his sontence. It was passed by Judge Patton, who preseveral times during the solemn scene. THE SENTENCE.

GEORGE DUNN: You have been indicted for the murder of John Anderson. You have had a fair and impartial trial. Your Counsel has displayed in your defence a degree of zear, intelligence and ability, worthy of all commendation. It was the endeavor of the Court to lay down the law with mildness, and to refresh from pre-occupying, by any positive expressions of their own views in regard to the facts, the minds of the jury. The jury, with less difficulty and hesitation than usually occur in such cases have found you guilty murder in the first degree. of murder in the first stegree.

Before pronouncing the sentence, which the law prescribes in such cases, it is proper that we should advert to some of the leading features of the transional control o tion on which this proceeding is founded, For some tion on which this proceeding is tounded, For some months before it took place you were in the habit of crossing, occasionally, the bridge at which the deceased was collector. Was it not already in a state of preparation for an event of your own seeking.
You produced the evidence by a witness to prove determine But if they did, they probably acted in the belief that any agression on the part of the deceased was designedly provoked by you for the purpose of gaining an excuse, and an opportunity of wreaking your vengeance apon him. Your former and repeated altercations with him—the hostile feelings which you evidently cheriated—the old grudge you harbored—the threat you previously made—your lawless and insulting conduct on the occasion—and the sature of the weapon you employed furnished the jure with good weapon you employed, furnished the jury with good grounds upon which to predicate such a conclusion, and pointed you out as one 'the old of social duty and fatally bent oo mischief." After a calm and deliberate review of all the proceedings in the case, we can find the only forfeit that will satisfy the offended majesty of the law. But let them turn from your case to that of the unfortunate man who has fallen a victim beneath your cruel and blood stained hands. You are a young THE subscriber that following celebrated brands of the importers, the following celebrated brands of ed was the head of a large family. He was well known and esteemed in the community as a good citizen-and an honest upright man. In taking his life, you have robbed a wife and many children of their friend and protector. You have reduced them to a state of dependence. In outlines of blood you have left on their memory a painful scene that will intrude. itself upon any prospect of happiness that will intrude up for them in after life. The moment the fatal blow was given, you fled, you afterwards declared you were not the person at all that committed the act. You were taken to the couch of the dying man, and there confronted with him.— He regretted (in the language of an intelligent witness) that he had no property to leave to his children, and did not know what would become of them.
