"A mad beast and fool; that's what you are," cried the porter, "and you're a dead man, for coming drunk into the palace, and hitting the king's servants. Hold In came the guards, with an officer at their head, who was going to visit his mistress, and had been dressing his curl at a looking glass. He had the looking glass in his hand. "Captain Francavilla," said the king, "is the world the fire, and was entirely red hot. I am pleased to inform you it was opened at the close of the fire, and all even to know me. Go before me, sir, to my rooms." And as he spoke the king shook off his assailants, as a lion does curs, and moved onwards.

Captain Françavilla put his finger gently before the king to stop him; and then looking with a sort of sta-Some madman." King Robert tors the looking glass from the captain's hand, and looked himself in the face. It was not his own face. It was another man's face, hot and vulgar; and had something in it at once melanche y and ridica-"By the living God!" exclaimed Robert, here is Principie,

"Bring him in !" "bring him in !" now exclaimed ther voices, the news having got to the royal spartment; "the king wants to see him." King Robert was brought in; and there, amidit roars of laughter, (for courts were not quite such wellbred places then as they are now,) he found himself face to face with another King Robert, sexted on his throne, and as like his former self as he himself was unlike, but with more dignity.
"Hideous impostor!" exclaimed Robert, rushing forward to tear him down.

The court, at the word "hideous," roared with greater laughter than before; for the king, in spite of his pride, was at all times a handsome man; and there was a strong feeling at present that he had never in

Robert, when half way to the throne, felt as if a vent his rage, but could not speak.

The figure on the throne looked him steadily in the ince. Robert thought it was a wizard, but hated far
